Asks Tax Deduction To Boom Bond Sales; Sees Compulsory Thrift Probable

By the Associated Press

A program of "induced savings" to help ward off inflation and finance the war was advocated yesterday by Chairman George (Democrat), of Georgia, of the Senate Finance Committee.

At the same time George and other Senators urged overall control of prices and wages, replacing the present selective price control system, as part of the general anti-inflation campaign that President Roosevelt said yesterday was being mapped.

"If we were brutally realistic we would know that some system of compulsory savings is not far off," George said in an interview. "Before we get to that I favor trying a voluntary system of induced savings, as part of the pending new tax bill."

Would Allow Deductions

He explained that by "induced savings" he had in mind a system whereby a taxpayer would be allowed certain deductions from net taxable income for income invested in Government bonds, or other war securities.

George also said he felt that a "withholding tax is inevitable now or later" and suggested this might be started at 5 per cent of "all wages, salaries, dividends, and interest payable at the source." While Treasury authorities have talked about a 15 per cent withholding tax, George said he favored a start at the 3 per cent level, adding that this should raise four billion dollars in revenue.

George, discussing excessive profits, said he believed these could best be reclaimed under tax programs, but that some special overall limit on profits from war contract profits might be advisable.

Others Support Controls

Support for overall control of prices, wages and salaries has been voiced by Senators O'Mahoney (Democrat), of Wyoming; Vandenberg (Republican), of Michigan, and Pepper (Democrat), of Florida, as well as George.

O'Mahoney told reporters the public and country were "impatient with Washington" because of a tendency to "take half steps" on the war program and related problems.

The Western Senator said the public wanted a "full utilization of our human and materials resources" and this could be attained best through all-out programs, including something akin to the Baruch plan.

A general ceiling on prices has been advocated by Bernard Baruch, New York financier who was chairman of the War Industries Board

Lights Must Be Out or Screened During Blackout

All lights, with the exception of several categories outlined yesterday by District Commissioners, must be extinguished or else screened so as to be invisible from the outside during Tuesday night's blackout, it was announced yesterday.

The exceptions apply principally to lights needed for air and water navigation, transportation, military equipment and in other fields not applicable to the vast majority of civilians.

Announcing that he and Chief Air-raid Warden Clement Murphy will give final instructions to wardens this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the headquarters at 1341 Maryland Avenue Northeast, Col. Lemuel Bolles, civilian defense director, warned that when the sirens sound for the blackout the drivers of all cars must immediately pull over to the curb and take shelter, leaving their car doors unlocked and the keys in the ignition switch.

Gallup Poll

Half of Voters Do Not Know Congressmen

By George Gallup
Director, American Institute of Public Opinion

Princeton, N. J., April 11.—One-half of all the Nation's voters are unable to name the Congressmen who represent their districts in Washington.

In the big cities, with 500,000 population or more, the proportion is even higher—nearly three out of every four voters are ignorant of the name of their Congressman. Farmers are the best informed of all groups on this score, nearly seven in every ten being able to give the correct name of their Representative.

These results of an American Institute of Public Opinion poll come at a time when many Representatives are taking short vacations from Washington to revisit their constituencies. Judging by the poll results, many of them seeking reelection apparently need to make more impression at home if they want the average voter even to learn their names.

Campaign Warming Up

It would by no means be just to conclude from these results that the American people are growing apathetic about national issues. The evidence from hundreds of public opinion studies points conclusively to the fact that the public is not only fully alive to modern problems, but is actually ahead of its legislators on most issues. Today's results simply emphasize the fact that the complexity of modern society, and the rapid urbanization of America, have made it increasingly difficult for voters in the big cities to become acquainted with their individual representative's activities.

It must be remembered, too, that the Congressional campaign is just

(Cripp's Text on Page 10.)

By the Associated Press

New Delhi, India, April 11.—The mission of Sir Stafford Cripps came to naught in an atmosphere of gloom today with rejection by the Congress Party and the Moslem League of the British proposals for Indian dominion.

"With the enemy at the gate," Sir Stafford announced his proposals had run afoul of a "state of criticism" and a "critical and unconstructive attitude." He said he was withdrawing the offers and returning to London tomorrow.

Neither the Congress Party, in which the country's 240 million Hindus are dominant, nor the Moslem League, which widely represents the 77 million Moslems, found the proposals acceptable.

It was on the issue of formation of an interim government pending settlement of India's constitutional problems after the war that negotiations were wrecked. Involved were defense powers which such a government would wield.

Feared Hindu "Dictatorship"

Congress Party leaders insisted upon a national government functioning with full powers as a cabinet, and said the British plan bore too much resemblance to the present executive council of the viceroy.

Cripps said a nominated cabinet, as proposed by the Congress Party, would be responsible to "no one but itself, could not be removed and would in fact constitute an absolute dictatorship" by the Hindu majority.

Maulana Abul Kalan Azad, president of the Congress Party, in a letter to Cripps explained that "We are agreeable to postponing the entire issue so that the largest possible measure of unity might be achieved in the present crisis for India's defense."

But Sir Stafford, possibly hinting at Hindu fear of accepting responsibility in this crisis, said the Congress Party's refusal of a compromise proposal on direction of defense meant that Azad believed he could not rally the Indian people.

Churchill Praises Envoy

Prime Minister Churchill sent this message to Sir Stafford:

"You have done everything in human power, and your tenacity, perserverance and resourcefulness have proved how great was the British desire to reach a settlement. Even though your hopes have not been fulfilled you have rendered a very important service to the common cause and the foundations have been laid for the future progress of the peoples of India."

Referring to the threat to India, Cripps said Britain would do her utmost to defend the country, that "America is doing all she can," and "now India must devote herself wholeheartedly with special effort in every field of activity in defending her soil and protecting her women and children from those ghastly horrors that have befallen her Chinese friends and neighbors."

"We may differ as to methods by which freedom can best be reached,

Reds Bag 300 Planes, Many Newly Rushed From West

By the Associated Press

London, April 11.—Still intent on achieving victory in 1942 despite reports that Germany is accumulating huge forces for new assaults, the Russians smashed hard today at the Nazi air strength being mustered for Adolf Hitler's post-thaw drive.

Dispatches from Kuibyshev said Soviet airmen and ground defenses had destroyed 300 German air force units in the last three days, 123 of them on the ground.

The heaviest toll was reported from the northwest front around Staraya Russa, where the Red army still is hacking at immobilized units of the German 16th Army.

Many of the planes destroyed were transferred only recently to the East from Yugoslavia, France and North Africa, captured pilots said.

On the land, battle reports from both sides indicated stiff engagements from Finland to the Black Sea, but no conclusive advance was claimed by either. The Russians did, however, report that 3000 Germans had been killed in the Bryansk area of the Central Front in the last few days, and Pravda, the Communist Party newspaper, said the Germans had lost the approach to an important city in this general sector.

Enemy Transport Sunk

The Moscow communique tonight reported the sinking of a 3000-ton enemy transport in the Barents Sea. It said there were no significant changes on the land front during the day.

Axis reports claimed the Germans on the Kerch Peninsula of the Crimea had destroyed or put out of action 99 Russian tanks during a recent Red army attack, that Germans and Rumanians had begun new and heavy assaults on the Russian Donets basin lines and that on the Leningrad front the Russians had made hard new attacks with tanks, with the battle still thundering.

On the Lapland front in the Arctic, Nazi mounted troops and Finns were reported to have taken a well-fortified strong point, destroying 40 Russian posts.

Essen Again Pounded As British Continue Aerial Onslaught

By the Associated Press

London, April 11.—New four-motored Stirling bombers, capable of carrying eight tons of bombs, were being added today to the British squadrons whose continuing offensive against industrial targets in Germany and German-occupied territory brought fresh destruction to the Ruhr last night.

"Some thousands of tons of bombs" were dropped on Germany during four nights of raids by British planes this week, the air ministry news service said. The average was "well over a ton a minute" for the duration of the raids.

"This was heavy bombing," it was observed.

"The R. A. F. bombing fleet is growing week by week," aviation sources said, affirming again that Britain's attacks from the air will continue with increasing vigor until the end of the war.

How Yanks Fare at Bay On Corregidor

By Dean Schedler

Corregidor Fortress, April 9 (Delayed).—Amid the swish and roar of bombs and shells, tired, blood-stained Filipino-American forces heard the radio "voice of freedom" assuring them tonight they had done far more than could be humanly expected in the epic siege of Bataan.

Men and nurses who had fought to the last and then run a two-mile gantlet of Japanese bombs and machine-gun bullets and Manila Bay sharks to get from Bataan to Corregidor Island received the praise in varying fashion—some with tears, others with fixed stares, some without sign of emotion.

Still Fighting Back

This voice of freedom, which has been broadcasting encouragement to the defenders from some undisclosed place in the Philippines ever since the Japanese overran Luzon Island, delivered a stirring word salute even while the men of Corregidor still were fighting back at the invaders and wondering what had become of their 30-odd thousand comrades trapped on Bataan.

"Bataan has fallen," said the voice of freedom. "The Filipino and American troops on this war-ravaged, blood-stained peninsula have laid down their arms.

Faithful to the End

"With their heads bloody but unbowed they have yielded to the superior force and numbers of the enemy.

"The world will long remember the epic struggle they put up . . . they have stood up uncomplaining under the gruelling fire of the enemy for more than three months . . .

American submarines operating in Far Eastern waters have sunk a Japanese destroyer and a large transport in addition to a 7000-ton merchant vessel and a submarine chaser, and have probably sunk a 4000-ton freighter, the Navy Department revealed yesterday.

The communique reporting the successes followed an earlier announcement by the Navy that the 1330-ton United States submarine Perch, under command of Lieut. Comdr. David A. Hurt, last reported operating in the Java Sea, was more than a month overdue and must be considered lost.

Details Change Estimates

Part of the sinkings were scored by an American submarine operating in Japanese waters on an extended cruise. This vessel accounted for the merchant vessel, the submarine chaser and the possible destruction of the freighter.

The other sinkings were reported by the Navy as a clarification of an earlier communique issued April 4. Adding a destroyer and a large transport to the toll of Japanese vessels announced April 4, the Navy at the same time stated that only one submarine had been responsible for all the sinkings.

Further details, apparently contained in a report by the submarine commander, made necessary the changes in the estimates, the Navy said.

The submarine's record on its cruise was one light cruiser sunk, one probably sunk, and a third one damaged, thus increasing by one its total of cruisers hit; one large trans-

Manila Forts Bombed

Upward of 12,000 Japanese troops have established themselves in half a dozen beachheads on Cebu Island but have been unable to progress far inland despite support from warships, dive-bombers and tanks, the War Department announced yesterday.

Simultaneously with their attempts to overrun another important Philippine Island, the Japanese concentrated long-range artillery, high-level bombers and naval guns against the island fortresses lying in the entrance to Manila Bay which still deny to them the use of that major harbor.

Terrain Mountainous

The Japanese descent in force on Cebu points to a plan to reduce the remaining islands one by one now that effective resistance on Luzon, chief of the group, has ceased. They prepared the way for their new landings by heavy bombardments from navy guns and dive-bombers, before sending troops and tanks ashore in landing barges.

Cebu is a narrow, mountainous island well to the south of Manila, 130 miles long and nowhere more than 20 wide. The city of Cebu, with a population of 143,000, is second in size only to Manila among the towns of the Philippines. It has been an important trade center.

Few Casualties Result

The Japanese evidently plan to cut the island in half, for their landings have been on the east and west shores of the center region. They have established beachheads at Toledo and Pinamungajan on the west side and at Cebu City, Argao,

Army to Reclaim 44,000 Rifles From Civilians

State guardsmen and Army military police battalions will be armed with shotguns, the War Department reported yesterday in announcing it was repossessing from civilians more than 44,000 rifles to be turned over to troops of the United Nations.

At the same time, an appeal was made to sportsmen who own a 1903 model Springfield or 1917 Enfield to turn it over to the Army.

None of the recalled weapons, it was indicated, are for use by the United States Army forces which are armed with the new fast firing automatic Garand.

U. S. Takes Big Stride Toward Becoming a Nation on Wings

High Schools' Aviation Program Regarded as 'Air-Conditioning' Step

By Edward T. Folliard
Post Staff Writer

The announcement last week that aeronautics is to be taught in high schools marked another big stride in Robert H. Hinckley's program to make the United States a Nation on wings.

Hinckley, Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Air, long ago contended it was not enough for America merely to be air-conscious, a condition brought about by Lindbergh's New York-to-Paris hop in 1927. It was necessary, he said, that it be air-conditioned.

What he was driving at was a program that would reach below the colleges and into the elementary schools, a program that would condition Americans to the air and the machines of the air in just the same way that we are conditioned to the ground and the machines of the ground. A youngster would ride a plane "as easily and naturally as a cowboy rides a pony."

The final phase is now about to be carried out. The United States Office of Education and the Civil Aeronautics Administration, backed by the Army and the Navy, have started plans for the actual teaching of aeronautics in America's elementary and high schools.

Whether any of the youngsters now attending such schools will ever go into action as pilots in the Nation's two-million-man Army Air Force and vastly enlarged Naval Air Force will depend on many things—on what happens this summer in Russia, in the Middle East and on the oceans of the world.

In any event, Assistant Secretary Hinckley is convinced that the United States is terribly late in

$50,000,000 District Housing Bill Signed by President

President Roosevelt has signed into law the Lanham bill authorizing the spending of 50 million dollars for war housing and public works in the District, it was learned yesterday.

Funds to finance the home and public works program were lacking yesterday, but there were assurances in Congress and in the Budget Bureau that they would be forthcoming soon.

A spokesman for the Budget Bureau said that a supplemental request for funds to start the building was expected to go to Congress during the next week.

District leaders in the House have given assurance that the request for housing and public building appropriations would receive swift action as soon as it is received from the Budget Bureau.

The measure authorizes the spending of 30 million dollars for housing Washington war workers by the National Housing Agency.

It also assigns the 20-million-dollar public works program to the Federal Works Agency, with the Congressional recommendation that at least five million dollars be allocated to construction of additional hospital facilities for the District.

Action along a second line to ease Washington's war-time housing conditions will be sought next week by the House District Committee.

District Committee Chairman Randolph said yesterday that his bill to

The grand jury is investigating the financial backing and Congressional contacts of defeatist publications and groups.

Attorney General Biddle has ordered searching investigation of all such activity, with prompt and firm action in every case where evidence is found. The Attorney General has ordered half a dozen prosecutions for sedition in the last few days.

High officials of the Department of Justice conferred until late yesterday with the chief of the criminal division, Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge. Among the conferees was Special Prosecutor William Power Maloney—who sent the German agent, George Sylvester Viereck, to jail and has worked on the special grand jury inquiry since it began last September 16.

The conferees refused to discuss their meeting.

U.S. War Effort Is Impressive In Australia

By H. R. Knickerbocker
Chief of the Chicago Sun Foreign Service

Somewhere in Australia, April 11. America's war effort in Australia already is most impressive. After a complete tour of every section of this continent, it is now possible to say with complete conviction that we are prepared to defend Australia with greater force than we ever mustered since the A. E. F. went to France.

This does not mean there is any comparison between the number of men now in Australia and the two million soldiers the United States placed in France before the end of the last war. There will probably never be any basis for comparison. But the quantities of war materials, and especially of airplanes, which have already entered and are now disposed about Australia are of such dimensions it is reasonable to deduce that we intend at all costs to hold this continent against the Japanese no matter how much stronger they become.

I have just completed a tour. In several thousand miles of travel, I saw in giant panorama the picture of a continent feverishly at work to defend itself against a greater mortal peril than any of its inhabitants had ever dreamed could visit it.

U. S. Soldiers Everywhere

For an American it is a source of keen pride to note that throughout the length and breadth of this continent, there is not a nook or cranny which hasn't its contingent of American fighting forces.

Furthermore, the change that has taken place since I first came through Australia on my way to Java in February is immense. At that time it looked as though America's contribution here might be the same "token" character as was the Allied contribution to the defense of Java. This is true no longer. We are all out of the "token" stage.

What we already have here is a young fighting Army. What makes an American's spirits climb though is to see Australia's skies not blackened but dotted with United States war planes. And to note that now gradually but surely the numerical air superiority which was Japan's since December 7, due to her careful preparations for the assassin's blow and due to her proximity to her bases, is being definitely overcome.

Cause for Optimism

This is the first time that anyone who witnessed the fall of Java has a right to feel optimistic. Nevertheless there's less than no excuse for American complacency, because in spite of this bright aspect of the picture we have not yet caught up with Japanese armored might and when their forces are released from the Philippines many expect that Australia will receive just such a blow, such as she is now preparing to resist, but that it will be even more violent than is generally expected.

Some good authorities assert that the Japanese, when and if they attack Australia, will do so with around 300,000 men. Everything then will depend on air power. It also is asserted the Japanese have shown no signs of using new models but still stick to their navy zero fighters, while America's newer pursuit planes are said to be superior to anything that we or the enemy have used before.

One scarcely imagines what a heartening effect it has upon Australians to view the stream of American war goods coming into their country—a stream which our own people declare is a mere trickle compared to the flood it is destined to be.

Allied Planes Cause Havoc At Koepang

By the Associated Press

Melbourne, April 11.—The Allied Air Force, mindful tonight that the fall of Bataan possibly had freed 200,000 Japanese veterans who might be hurled against Australia, have struck once more at the enemy air base at Koepang, causing great destruction.

Hangars and other buildings and the airdrome runways were blasted from low level at the capital of overrun Dutch Timor, 350 miles off the northern port of Darwin. Great fires were set.

Army Minister Francis M. Forde pointed up the danger inherent in the loss of Bataan by warning Australians they must concentrate all their energy on an all-out war effort, and must organize on the theory that the Japanese will launch a full scale invasion.

"It is this offensive and aggressive spirt so effectively advocated by Gen. MacArthur and Gen. Blamey that will enable us to halt any attempt at invasion and regain for our allies the temporarily lost islands of the Pacific," he said.

The enemy was quiet today after a heavy Japanese bomber and a navy zero fighter were destroyed yesterday in a raid on Port Moresby, New Guinea. Antiaircraft fire kept the seven marauding planes at 20,000 feet while United States and Australian pursuit planes rose to attack.

A Dutch warship straggled into Perth from the ruined naval base at Sourabaya, Java, and the commander said the port was so effectively scorched by explosions and sunken ships that the enemy could not use it.

said, from among the hundreds of bombers which hit mainly last night at Krupp armament factories in the Ruhr. One of the main targets was reported to have been Essen, highly industrialized and much-bombed city in western Germany.

The raid was described as "a good show" although stormy weather over the continent hindered the bombing operations.

Other squadrons attacked the harbor and shipping at Le Havre, in German-occupied French territory, and mines were laid in coastal waters.

Associated Press WIREPHOTO

The landings were effected against the "fierce resistance" of small American and Filipino forces on the island, and the War Department reported that Japanese casualties are mounting as fighting continues, with the invaders confined to the immediate neighborhood of their beachheads.

While operations were being undertaken against Cebu, Japanese artillery and aircraft concentrated against the three island fortresses of Corregidor, Fort Hughes and Fort Drum.

Corregidor and Fort Hughes especially were under a crossfire of long-range artillery on the south shore of Manila Bay and from warships out at sea. But they engaged in vigorous counter battery work with the Nipponese batteries on the south shore. Batteries newly brought up along the shore of conquered Bataan also joined in the fire directed against the fortresses.

Japanese aircraft subjected the islands to intensive attack for the past 24 hours. But the islands' defenses are heavy and the gunners manning them are veterans. Very few casualties were reported and little damage was done for all the Japanese expenditure of ammunition.

Informed officials say that many months may elapse before the fate of the more than 33,000 American-Filipino troops on Bataan Peninsula is known. Many of them undoubtedly died in their final valiant defense.

Tokyo broadcasts reported violent street fighting in the city of Cebu and said it was "shrouded in smoke" as Americans and Filipinos endeavored to apply a scorched earth policy by firing "vessels in the bay, oil tanks and other establishments."

The Tokyo radio also broadcast a report that two days ago Maj. Gen. Edward P. King, commanding American-Filipino forces on Bataan, and a group of his officers appeared at Limay under a flag of truce and handed a written surrender to a Japanese commander. The latter was said to have "refrained from giving a definite answer." Gen. King, 57, is a native of Atlanta.

No such word had been received here, but military quarters regarded it as not improbable that there had been a formal surrender on Bataan.

Communique No. 185

(Based on reports received up to 9:30 a. m., E. W. T., yesterday.)

"1. Philippine theater:

"Despite fierce resistance by the small American and Philippine force, the enemy was able to effect a landing on the Island of Cebu on April 10. The Japanese force now debarking on that island is estimated at 12,000. The landing is being supported by dive bombers and a heavy fire from hostile naval vessels. Tank units have been landed by the Japanese.

"The defenders continue to resist stubbornly and the invaders have been unable to advance inland more than a few miles at any point. Enemy casualties have been heavy.

"Corregidor and Fort Hughes in Manila Bay were subjected to intensive air attacks during the past twenty-four hours. However, our casualties were few and the damage inflicted was slight.

"Our fortified islands were under intermittent fire from enemy artillery in Bataan and on the south shore of the bay.

"There is no communication between our troops in Bataan and those in Corregidor.

"Bataan has fallen—but the spirit that made it stand—a beacon to all liberty-loving peoples of the world—cannot fall."

Looking across the two-mile stretch of water toward Bataan, the men of Corregidor heard great explosions throughout the night and saw huge puffs of smoke and flame indicating that the last of the defending forces were blowing up their own munitions dumps, carrying out the scorched earth formula to cheat the enemy of military spoils.

We on Corregidor can only imagine the variety of hell these last men are going through. Bataan has been pounded incessantly by planes never opposed by anything but antiaircraft fire. The exhausted Filipinos and Americans can only fight back with what they have and take what the Japs are giving.

All night long I saw small boats creeping across the channel with the few soldiers and civilians able to make the perilous dash for the comparative safety of Corregidor.

Japanese planes bombed and machined-gunned their course actively, but that was nothing new to the occupants. The main thing they were interested in was sleep.

Action has been so fast and parts of the situation so veiled in confusion that it is difficult to envision a full picture of what has happened in these last hours, but I hope some day to be able to pass on the story which has been written in blood on a page unique in history.

Even Hospital No Refuge

One striking phase of it can be reported. Yesterday Japanese planes unloaded a stick of bombs on the defenders' base hospital on Bataan. Granting Tokyo the benefit of the doubt, Lieut. Gen. Jonathan M. Wainwright expressed the belief that the attack on the hospital was unintentional, since the area was well marked.

Throughout this ordeal Dr. Erwin R. Nelson of the hospital corps operated without a letup. Circumstances required that his hand be steady even when a bomb came screaming down nearby during an amputation or the administering of a spinal anaesthetic.

A bomb came so close that Dr. Nelson ducked, just once—under the operating table. He asked his patient if he wanted to be put on the floor but the half-anaesthetized man said he would take his chances on the table.

Two nurses, Rita G. Palmer, of Hampton, N. H., and Rosemary Hogan, of Chattanooga, Okla., were slightly injured and were brought to Corregidor. Dr. Nelson, who accompanied them, expressed amazement at the courage they had shown under fire.

port damaged (earlier this ship was reported as two seaplane tenders), one supply ship damaged, and one destroyer and one large transport sunk as well as an unidentified vessel damaged. This last item was an increase of one ship over the earlier communique, which merely reported that one large transport and one unidentified ship had been hit by one torpedo each.

Navy officials said that the mistakes probably occurred because the submarine mistook the third cruiser torpedoed for the one previously hit, and in a quick observation before submerging mistook the large transport for two seaplane tenders.

Fourth Submarine Lost

Loss of the Perch brought to four the number of submarines reported lost or missing by the Navy Department since the war began. The others were the Shark, reported overdue in the western Pacific; the S-26, which went down after a collision off Panama, and the Sea Lion, demolished at Cavite in the Philippines.

She was the twenty-ninth naval vessel announced as lost since December 7.

The announcement said that next of kin of all members of the crew have been notified, but gave no estimate of the total personnel.

Normally, the crew of the Perch numbered 50.

The Perch, commissioned November 19, 1936, had a length overall of 300 feet 6 inches, a beam of 25 feet 1 inch and a designed displacement of 1330 tons. The submarine was built by the Electric Boat Co. at Groton, Conn.

Commanded by Virginian

Lieut. Comdr. Hurt, 38, of Pounding Hill, Va., was graduated from the Naval Academy in June, 1925. His first assignment to sea duty was on the U. S. S. Raleigh. In 1928 he was transferred to submarines and he assumed command of the Perch in May, 1939.

Reds Blast 300 Nazi Planes

On the central and northern fronts Russian troops were said in official dispatches to have annihilated 4854 more German soldiers in fierce struggles with tank battles spreading.

The Germans were believed to have drawn about 65,000 fresh troops from occupied Europe, the dispatches said.

The reports said the reinforcements included the 216th and 208th Infantry divisions from France; the Fifth Alpine Rose division, which saw action in Crete, and the 215th and 365th Artillery regiments.

The new troops were said to have arrived in special trains which roared across Europe to Russia with few stops. On arriving in Russia, the troops were reported to have been merged immediately with units which had suffered heavy losses during the winter campaign.

As a result, it was declared, the Nazi occupation forces were greatly reduced in France, Greece and Yugoslavia.

One German division also was reported to have arrived from Yugoslavia to reinforce the shattered Sixth and Seventeenth Army Corps around Kharkov.

Reinforced Japs Advancing On Three Fronts in Burma

By the United Press

New Delhi, India, April 11.—A triple assault by reinforced and mechanized Japanese columns gravely imperiled Chinese troops defending the approaches to Mandalay tonight while another enemy invasion force stabbed at the gateway to western Burma's oil fields, less than 200 miles southeast of the Indian frontier.

A Chungking communique disclosed that units of China's Fifth and Sixth Armies on the eastern flank had inflicted 2000 casualties on superior Japanese troops pushing northwestward from captured Toungoo, but it admitted that the enemy had advanced more than 18 miles beyond that key city.

Severe fighting, the communique said, was raging Thursday northwest of Yedashe on the Toungoo-Mandalay Railroad. Another enemy advance was reported along the Sittang River, east of the railroad, and a third enemy force was said to have moved westward from Thailand in an attempt to capture Mawchi, center of Burma's tin mine area about 35 miles east of Toungoo.

The Chungking communique, admitting a critical situation on the Toungoo front, followed official reports that Japanese motorized spearheads had reached a point 60 miles north of captured Prome in the Irrawaddy Valley.

Meanwhile, heavily-reinforced Japanese aerial raiders were reported spraying the Burma front with bombs and machine-gun fire in a supreme attempt to make Allied defensive positions untenable.

The Chungking communique reported a fierce battle was continuing in the Sva River sector northeast of Toungoo.

Victory in Air

Outnumbered American and British fliers, fighting a desperate delaying action until promised reinforcements arrive, have struck back at the Japanese aerial raiders with two decisive victories this week, destroying an estimated 23 enemy planes within 72 hours. But a Burma command communique admitted the situation was serious and said the Japanese were bombing front lines, rear bases and undefended cities.

On the western front the Japanese virtually commanded the air and were forcing weary British defenders to retreat slowly into the heart of the Minbu and Yenangyaung oil fields.

The Burma command communique revealed that Japanese planes yesterday suffered their first aerial reverse in three days when American and British pilots downed at least seven enemy fighters.

Early Action Seen On Army Pay Bill

Measure Might Be Passed This Week, May Says

Copyright by New York Tribune, Inc.

The speedy enactment of the Army pay raise bill into law seemed assured yesterday when Representative Andrew May (Democrat), of Kentucky, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, revealed that the War Department had given its blessing to the measure. May said his committee would begin hearings Tuesday on the bill which increases privates' pay from $21 to $42 a month with similar increases for other ranks up to and including second lieutenants and predicted its final passage by the end of this week.

Stating that the bill would not remain long on his committee's calendar, May said, "If these boys are going to be given a raise in pay, they ought to have it and if not, they ought to know it."

But all the auguries point to the American soldiers getting the pay raises authorized for them in the bill sponsored by Senator Edwin C. Johnson (Democrat), of Colorado. The Senate has already approved the measure by a unanimous vote, 73 to 0, as reported by its Military Affairs Committee, and its passage by the House is regarded as virtually a certainty.

Furthermore, Senator Alben W. Barkley (Democrat), of Kentucky, yesterday indicated that President Roosevelt would sign the bill when it comes before him for approval.

The so-called compulsory allotment bill will probably be reported out of the committee at the same time as the Johnson bill and introduced as a single piece of legislation, May said. This bit of legislation, by permitting deductions from a soldier's pay for those he leaves behind, will pave the way for possible induction of millions of men, now deferred because of dependents.

Embodied in a bill fathered by Representative Andrew Edmiston (Democrat), of West Virginia, the compulsory allotment plan provides for obligatory deductions of up to $15 a month from a soldier's pay. This sum will be matched, or, if he has several dependents, bettered by the Government and the entire amount paid to the dependents.

Another measure in favor of the soldiers pending in Congress is a bill by Representative Paul J. Kilday (Democrat), of Texas, to provide free laundry, cleaning and haircuts for the men under arms which would have the effect of adding about $5 a month to their pay.

Mission a Failure, Cripps Returning

but upon one thing surely we must all be agreed—that it cannot be reached by conquest of India by a power such as Japan," he added in a later, farewell broadcast.

The British proposals were for postwar dominion status with right of withdrawal from the British Empire, the right of Moslem states to abstain from the Indian union and even form a union of their own, and the right of representation for the Indian princes in the constitution-making body. Defense at present was to be directed by the British.

The Congress Party, in a 1500-word statement made public only today, rejected the proposal on the grounds that recognition of the Indian states would form "enclaves where foreign authority still prevails" and where foreign armed forces could be maintained. Such a situation, it said, would be a "perpetual menace" to Indian freedom.

Further, it charged that retention by the British of the responsibility for defense reduced proposed Indian self-government to "a farce and nullity' in wartime when defense "covers almost every sphere of life and administration."

In conclusion, it declared that the present government was "lacking in competence" to undertake defense and "it is only the people of India, through their popular representatives who may shoulder this burden worthily."

Only "the realization of present freedom could light the flame" of Indian defense, the statement said.

On the other hand, the Moslem League, while expressing gratification that pakistan, the right of Moslem autonomy, had been recognized, complained that the proposals did not go far enough and that a Moslem majority or large minority in the provinces would be dominated by Hindu assemblies.

Resentment Rises Toward U. S.

As the negotiations ended, a disquieting feature was noted by observers in the deterioration of opinion which Nationalist leaders hold toward America.

These leaders resented the attitude of the American press, which they considered ill informed and patronizing, and what they thought was a widespread feeling in America that once Louis Johnson, President Roosevelt's special minister, came to New Delhi all tangles would automatically disappear.

Indian congressmen were now talking of American imperialism as being more dangerous than British imperialism because American imperialism, they said, was not based on territorial acquisition but upon commercial supremacy and was "more up-to-date and streamlined."

London April 11 (U.P.)—British authorities said tonight that the general principle of Britain's offer of freedom to India, including dominion status, would lapse for duration of the war but would be available again after the war.

China Relief Support Urged By President

By the Associated Press

President Roosevelt, participating in a program to raise a seven-million-dollar relief fund for China, said last night that "China has paid in blood, tears and treasure as high a price as a people can possibly pay for the freedom in which it believes."

In a letter to Paul G. Hoffman, chairman of the United China relief, Mr. Roosevelt recalled that this government had expressed on several occasions its sense of the importance of the "magnificent resistance of the Chinese people to our common foe." His letter was read on a program broadcast over the Blue Network and by short wave to the world.

Since China took the field five years ago, Mr. Roosevelt wrote, "Three million Chinese have given their lives that China might be free. Fifty million Chinese citizens driven out of their farms and villages and cities by the Japanese are now refugees in their own land."

The President said that "Americans who wish to give concrete expression to China's valiant fight are given, by your campaign, a splendid opportunity to do so."

A message from President Lin Sen of the Republic of China, read by the Chinese Ambassador, Dr. Hu Shih, said that:

"We in China are proud to be united with America in a fighting partnership against a common foe. We are proud as a partner who is giving to the common cause all we have to give. We are grateful for the ever-increasing support from your government to our government because we know that you are helping China because China, too, is helping you.

"But beyond such government-to-government transactions we sincerely appreciate the desire of the American people to make an individual contribution to the help of China as an expression of their personal sympathy for the individual men, women and children of China who together constitute this sworn ally of yours."

Army to Use Many Planes Airlines Own

By the Associated Press

The War Department announced last night that the Army air forces would take over approximately 25 per cent of the domestic commercial airliners and use them for carrying military cargoes and personnel.

They will be operated under direction of the commanding general of the Air Service Command, the Department said, and added:

"Key airline personnel will be encouraged to stay at their posts as the most effective and patriotic course unless and until their country indicates it requires them in the armed forces."

Latest available statistics credit the commercial airlines with about 340 transports. Twenty-five per cent of this number would be 85.

Since the war began the Army has received at least 30 airliners from operating companies. On January 26, it announced that Transcontinental and Western Air had turned over its fleet of five stratoliners—ships equipped for operation at very high altitudes. A month later, the Department said that 25 transports, urgently needed for military service, were being made available by commercial companies.

In its announcement yesterday, the Army said that the additional airliners it is securing would be used for carrying military supplies and personnel "only to such points and at such times as may be necessitated by military requirements."

The Department added that with the 25 per cent allocation announced yesterday, domestic airline service has been reduced to the minimum deemed essential to the war effort and "it is not presently intended to make further reductions" in the civil airline equipment.

"Civil air transportation," the announcement said, "is of vital importance to the war effort. Disruption in essential airline service is to be avoided whenever possible. However, airline service to the public cannot exceed that quantity which is essential to the successful prosecution of the war."

It was emphasized that the Army's action represented an acceptance of the "offer of the airlines of the United States to participate in the war effort."

The decision to accept the planes, the Department said, was "based upon a survey of the civil air transport system and the Nation's present air transport requirements. With the airplanes which they will reserve for civil operation, the survey indicated, the domestic airlines will be able to provide a common carrier service essential to the war effort."

A priorities system for seat and cargo space in commercial airplanes already is in operation. Personnel of the White House and the armed services have first ratings, with priorities also given to personnel of other Government agencies "whose activities are essential to the war effort."

Truck Production For Civilian Use Halted by WPB

By the Associated Press

The War Production Board yesterday ordered all production of trucks for civilian use halted after present quotas are completed.

In other actions, the board:

Forbade the sale, lease or option of used electric generating equipment and used steam boilers without specific Government authorization. This order applies to manufacturers, wholesalers, dealers and all other persons with such equipment in their possession. Equipment worth less than $1000 a unit is exempt.

Producers of medium trucks will have until April 30 to close down their assembly lines, while manufacturers of heavy trucks must finish by May 31. Production of light trucks stopped last February 1.

5 Days in Open Boat Enough, Says Survivor

Rowing a lifeboat on the storm-tossed Atlantic is no job for a plumber and when Edward T. Magruder, a 25-year-old practitioner of that trade, returned to his home here yesterday it was with the grim determination that never again will he be put in a position where it may be necessary for him to abandon a torpedoed ship and spend five days in an open boat before being rescued.

Along with 15 other crewmen and passengers of a "small" freighter which was sunk at 5:55 a. m. on April 3, Magruder was picked up by a Navy patrol boat last Wednesday after their small lifeboat had made its way across more than 200 miles of open water toward the New Jersey coast.

An employe of Pan-American Airways, Magruder sat in his living room at 2334 High Street Southeast yesterday and told how Third Mate Philip W. Babcock, armed with an unworkable compass and a storehouse of navigating skill, set the course of their craft by dead reckoning and was doing so well at his task that the lifeboat was only 50 or 60 miles off the Jersey shore when its occupants were picked up after having been first sighted by a Navy plane.

He was loud in his praise, too, of the Navy. "They gave us everything but their boat when they picked us up," he said, and treated us like millionaires. They carried us to New York."

Still missing are 37 sailors and passengers from the torpedoed ship, who are assumed to have drowned. Among them was the vessel's captain.

Magruder, a native of Hyattsville, Md., who was returning to his home after four months' foreign service for his employer, said that when the torpedo struck the ship he was awake and fully dressed, since he had taken the precaution of sleeping in his clothes every night.

He grabbed his overcoat, ran to a lifeboat and helped lower it with nine other men, the youngest of whom was about 20. When the lifeboat hit the water, Magruder said he and his companions picked up six more men who had jumped overboard and then started rowing away from the ship which, hit cleanly amidships, sank in about 15 minutes.

Magruder said he saw two other lifeboats and one raft leave the ship, but these three craft disappeared from sight in about two hours and were not seen again. None of the men saw the submarine which attacked them.

On the first day, the lifeboat came within a half mile of another lifeboat which he believed was from a foreign ship. No effort was made to make contact with the other craft. Thereafter, Magruder said, they saw nothing until the Navy plane which led to their rescue.

Living on rations, the men in Magruder's lifeboat got by on one cup of water and a few hardtack biscuits daily, but on Easter they threw a "banquet" and treated themselves to a couple of graham crackers each along with increased rations of water and hardtack.

The food, such as it was, was plentiful and an ample supply was on hand when the men were picked up. Magruder said it wasn't exactly pleasant eating, but the food was sufficient to keep up their spirits and provide strength for the rowing, which they did in shifts of four men each when there was no wind to fill the red sails aboard the craft.

At no time, he said, was there any doubt that they would reach shore. Other than a touch of seasickness, no one aboard the craft was ill and the only real hardship, he said, was the inability to get any sleep.

"You might doze off a minute," he said, "but then a small wave of water would hit you in the face. It was pretty tough."

When he got home yesterday, he was unable to present his wife with the pretty gold ring he had bought her—it is lying at the bottom of the Atlantic. But he did receive from her a wrist watch, his Christmas present which she had been unable to mail him.

D. C. Minister's Son Loses Life In Convoy Duty

By Robert Tate Allan
The Post Church Editor

"A death struggle this certainly is, though what is to die I do not know. Is it too much to hope that greed and privilege are doomed?"

IRWIN

These were the last written words of 27-year-old Warren H. Irwin, of Benning, D. C., who died last month in a Glasgow hospital after the torpedoing of the convoying merchant ship Lancaster, on which he was a gunner.

Warren was a member of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and opposed to war, but his attitude changed after "Pearl Harbor," according to his father, the Rev. Samuel W. Irwin, also of Benning. Dr. Irwin received last word from his son in a letter postmarked March 9, Halifax.

Shortly after Christmas, Warren said farewell to his duties as technician at the Washington Institute of Technology in College Park, enlisted in the Naval auxiliary service, and married Miss Edith Redding, of College Park, before sailing.

The congregation of Forrestville Methodist Church, of which the Irwins are members, will hold a memorial service for Warren today at 11 a. m., led by the Rev. Thomas B. Ehlers, pastor.

Dr. Irwin pointed out that his son was what is known in Methodist circles as a "local" preacher, having the eligibility to serve as substitute preacher, and shared his father's interest in religion.

With other members of the family, he spent many years in Europe, where Dr. Irwin was engaged in Methodist educational work. Some of Warren's early education was received in Rome where Irwin was in charge of Methodist schools. Warren's mother died ten years ago. There is one sister, Barbara, at home, and two sisters in California.

Warren was born in Newport, R. I., and when he returned from Europe, studied at East Greenwich Academy, near Providence, R. I., and later was graduated from Louisiana State University. He taught in Tennessee schools for about a year.

Eyewitness Describes Raid On Jap Islands

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—An eyewitness description of the first American offensive action in the war was given today by Capt. Joseph J. Clark of the U. S. Navy who was executive officer of an aircraft carrier which attacked the Gilbert and Marshall Islands in the Pacific last January 31.

Naval dive bombers, leaving the carrier more than 100 miles from the islands, flew in to attack a Japanese seaplane tender, barracks and small vessels in harbor.

"The bombers dropped two bombs on the tender, one on the barracks and set fires and strafed fishing vessels and also fired small buildings on shore and accounted for antiaircraft batteries," Capt. Clark said.

At Makin nine dive bombers found a Japanese seaplane tender of the Kaomi class and two four-engined flying boats on the water. The tender was hit and one of the seaplanes set on fire.

"There was heavy smoke and fire on the seaplane tender and bombs dropped near the vessel but were not seen to land directly. The vessel was badly damaged, but we do not know that she was sunk."

The raid cost six U. S. planes and two others were lost later during a bad storm.

Two Japanese patrol bombers in the harbor were also destroyed in the attacks which lasted 5 hours and 50 minutes. A third patrol bomber was shot down as it neared the carrier by planes taking off from the ship.

Capt. Clark described Japanese planes as "excellent" and "very well built."

Master Sergt. Harry M. Hayes, who rescued 18 persons from conquered Java in a patched-together bomber, has always had a flair for doing the unusual and saving the lives of people, according to his sister, Mrs. Mary Hayes Rowell, 30, of 1803 Biltmore Street Northwest.

"I was made very happy," said Mrs. Rowell last night, "when I read about my brother in The Post. But I knew he'd do something like that if the situation ever arose."

Mrs. Rowell referred to the "impossible" feat of Sergt. Hayes in carrying 18 American, British and Dutch officers, women and children into a plane he had assembled out of two other wrecks, from Java to Australia. The exploit is considered unparalleled by Army officials, since Hayes had never piloted a plane before.

But, to the 36-year-old sergeant, it was just another incident. Back in July, 1938, he was awarded, at the direction of President Roosevelt, a medal for outstanding heroism in saving the lives of three fliers when a B-10-B Army bomber crashed into the sea near Mariata Point, Mala Peninsula, Panama. Lieut. K. B. Dobson, pilot, and two privates, were trapped in the big plane as it sank partly, beneath the waves. Hayes, an observer on the bomber, stripped off his clothes, dived beneath the surface and extricated the men. He swam with each one to the beach.

Hayes, a native of Warsaw, Ky., joined the Army 16 years ago, and is a member of the famous Caterpillar Club, Mrs. Rowell said.

"He jumped from a plane during some maneuvers in Georgia," she said, "but I don't know much about the details. I have not seen him since 1939—in San Antonio, Tex.—and the last time I heard from him was several months ago when he was in Egypt. After that I sort of lost track of him until I read that he had been in Java."

She said her brother was always tinkering with mechanical toys and engines when he was boy. Their father was a prominent engineer.

"So, you see," she said, "engines and mechanical things come natural with him."

Hayes has a wife, Anne, and two small children living in San Antonio.

Survivor Tells Of Torture in Open Boat

By International News Service

Sydney (Sunday), April 12.—One of the war's most amazing episodes—the saga of two harrowing months spent in an open lifeboat on the Pacific—was told today by the sole survivor of a freighter sunk by the Japanese on the night of the Pearl Harbor attack.

The lone figure in this real-life adventure story, Murray Chambers, who has just arrived in Australia, told how he finally stumbled ashore on the Gilbert Islands, only to fall into the hands of Japanese troops stationed there. But when the American fleet shelled the islands January 31, he took advantage of the turmoil among the surprised defenders and fled in a small boat.

"The ship was 200 miles off Honolulu, ablaze with lights, when a submarine suddenly broke through the waves 50 yards ahead. It crash-dived immediately to avoid being run down, then came up astern of us and fired two torpedoes.

Both torpedoes missed, Chambers said. The submarine swung around, unlimbered its deck gun and pumped seven shells into the helpless freighter.

Chambers was dazed and flung into the well deck by the concussion of one of the shells. Seeing a lifeboat floating 20 yards away from the doomed freighter, he dived overboard.

"The lifeboat was crammed with men and barely keeping above water because shrapnel had punctured the air tanks," Chambers said. "We tore up pieces of our clothing to plug the leaks, managing to make the boat almost water tight.

"For a week we tried to reach Honolulu, but though we rowed until our hands were masses of blisters and our arms were leaden the winds drove us farther and farther back.

"In desperation, we decided to try to reach the Gilbert Islands.

"It was terribly cold at night on those dark waters. We slept close together for warmth, but we were all soaked and shivering."

A high wave washed the captain overboard one stormy night. One by one the other men in the little lifeboat died. Finally, Chambers alone was left, seasick, exhausted and almost starved.

For 10 torturous days and nights after his last mate had succumbed, Chambers drifted in the Pacific.

Missing U. S. Submarine and Its Skipper

2 Ships Sunk Off East Coast; 20 Men Missing

By the Associated Press

Brunswick, Ga., April 11.—Two more medium-sized merchant ships have fallen victim to Axis submarines off the Atlantic Coast and Coast Guard ships have rescued 54 survivors, bringing them to this port. Twenty crewmen are missing and feared killed. One died in a lifeboat.

The two ships were torpedoed within an hour of each other and were approximately three miles apart in the Atlantic.

The first ship, captained by T. P. Davenport, of Port Arthur, Tex., was struck by a torpedo on the starboard side near the engine room. After the crew abandoned the vessel, the submarine surfaced and shelled her 15 to 20 times.

Capt. Davenport said he believed 17 of his crew of 37 were trapped in their quarters. Three lifeboats were launched and 20 men got in them. No attempt was made to shell the lifeboats, but one crewman died of injuries he received when the torpedo hit the ship.

Davenport's ship was sunk about 2 a. m., Eastern War Time.

The captain of the other vessel, James S. Poche, of Baton Rouge, La., reported that one of his crew of 38 was believed drowned and two more trapped after a torpedo struck the starboard side between the engine room and bunkers about 2:50 a. m. The other 35 jumped into lifeboats.

A crewman on Capt. Poche's ship said that the submarine that sank them surfaced and cruised around between the lifeboats. He also said that one man on the submarine's deck called, "Come over here, we'll save you."

The submarine was reported by Capt. Poche to be a large one.

U. S. Bombing of Germany Declared Near

By the Associated Press

London, April 11.—The United States Air Force will join the R. A. F. in blasting Germany within a month, and the two Allies will do everything in their power to help Russia's epic effort to crush the common Nazi enemy, highly placed experts predicted tonight.

This, they said, would be the upshot of the visit here of the United States Chief of Staff, Gen. George C. Marshall, and Harry Hopkins, President Roosevelt's trusted supply man.

The British and Americans were pictured as expecting Germany's supreme effort this summer to be directed at the two supply lines over which increasing quantities of vital war materiel are moving to the decisive Russian battlefront to equip the Soviet armies, long on man power but short on machines of war.

The German thrusts are expected toward the oil riches of the Caucasus and the Persian Gulf, and against the northern route which ends at Murmansk and Archangel.

Jap Stab at Russia Seen

The growing U. S. military establishments which Marshall is inspecting and the increasing pool of United States planes in Britain were taken as indications that American pilots would be bombing Germany within a month to retard the Nazi's eastward offensive.

The United States, Britain and Russia will see a Japanese stab in the Russian back in Siberia as one of the main dangers of this year. British military opinion is convinced that a Japanese attack will take place either just before or coincident with the opening of Hitler's main effort. The Russians say simply: "We are ready if it comes."

Ready to Bomb Japan

One highly placed Russian, discussing the possibility, asked what observers thought the Japanese could put into a Siberian attack.

"Fourteen to 17 divisions," was the reply.

"It won't be enough," said the Russian.

There have been candid assertions in Russian circles that they will never suffer a Pearl Harbor at Vladivostok. And there are equally candid hints that if Japan attacks the Soviet, Red bombers will swiftly span the 680 miles to Tokyo and the great industrial cities with the one object of destroying the Japanese war foundries. This would be accompanied by a carte blanche invitation to the United States to join the Russians in the blasting of the closely packed and highly inflammable Japanese industrial cities.

Both American and British quarters were silent officially on the trends of the virtually continuous conferences Gen. Marshall and Hopkins are holding with British leaders, because of the danger of tipping off the Axis in 1942 strategy. The very presence here of Marshall and Hopkins at such a critical time—rather than a visit to other theaters—emphasized the British and United States view that Hitler at the moment is the No. 1 enemy and Russia is the main hope of liquidating him.

Welles Hints Allied Drive This Year

By International News Service

Acting Secretary of State Welles yesterday strongly indicated that Gen. George C. Marshall's mission to London will result in surprise offensives this year to smash Axis and Japanese forces on the world's multiple battlefronts.

The immediate objective of the United Nations' fighting strategy, Welles specifically declared, must be to crush the adversaries by concerted action with all the strength at their command—whenever the opportunity presents itself.

United action, the acting secretary stressed, should be translated into telling blows against the enemy in the Atlantic and Pacific land, sea and air fighting as well as on the diplomatic and economic fronts.

Welles made these statements in the way of comment to London reports that Gen. Marshall and Munitions Czar Harry Hopkins are stressing upon Britain's war leaders the imperative need for determined smashing offensive action, now.

For obvious reasons of military secrecy, Welles declined to be drawn out on precisely when or where a united offensive might be undertaken, but as to its advisability, he referred to the speech Soviet Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff made in Philadelphia Friday night. Litvinoff asked for a "definite united effort by Britain and the Soviet Union now, and supplementary aid from the United States to smash Hitler into complete destruction and final defeat."

Welles remarked that he thought the Soviet envoy had raised a very important point in asking for a united effort by the powers engaged in the struggle against the aggressors.

Two D.C. Men Escape Bataan And 'Thumb' Way to Hawaii

Two Washingtonians and two companions have arrived in Honolulu after breaking through the Japanese blockade of Bataan, it was learned here yesterday.

Lewis G. Phillips, 34, of 1913 Randolph Street Northeast, and Jeff J. McNamee, 40, former Southern Railway engineer here, told a United Press reporter that they had "thumbed" their way by bus and plane and then across the Pacific by ship from Bataan to Hawaii in a gruelling 47-day trip.

Phillips, son of Mrs. Elsie M. Phillips, and a graduate of McKinley High School and University of Maryland, left this country for the Philippines last June to serve as an engineer with the Navy Department.

Mrs. Phillips, a widow employed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, said last night she had recently received a short letter from her son in the Philippines dated February 2. "I'm rejoicing tonight," she on learning the good news.

Jeff McNamee, a native of Water Valley, Miss., who lived in Takoma Park and was a civil engineer with Southern Railway for 15 years, went to Hawaii last year with a contractor to carry out Navy building there. Friends here last heard from him just before the attack on Pearl Harbor. At that time he was sick in a Manila hospital. His wife and two children live in Honolulu.

The other participants in the break through were Jack T. McCabe of Detroit and Gerald J. Ciaffe of Pittsfield.

McNamee, who had moved to Bataan the day before Manila fell, told a United Press reporter:

"Bataan had no air protection whatever. If they had had 10 planes it would have made a big difference.

"One night we got word that planes were coming at last and we went to work widening the runways and getting ready. We got out floodlights for the planes, but they never came."

McNamee praised the fortitude of the American and Filipino soldiers for their courageous fight. The soldiers existed mostly on rice and salmon.

"The lot of those on Bataan was bad enough, but I understand it was even worse for those captured by the Japs," McNamee said. "We heard unofficially that they gave the prisoners in Manila only a handful of uncooked rice a day. But the stories of the treatment accorded prisoners elsewhere are so terrible, I won't even go into them."

Once the Japanese, trying to get behind the American lines, landed about 500 soldiers on a beach from which sheer cliffs arose. The Japanese sought shelter in the caves that honeycombed the cliff, but Yankee ingenuity eliminated them. Burlap sacks were filled with dynamite, McNamee said, fuses lighted and then the bags were swung over the top of the cliff by ropes and into the caves.

"Those gunnysack bombs cleaned out every Jap," he said.

Revolt Flares, Nazis Threaten Dire Penalties

By the United Press

London, April 11.—A new wave of Nazi terror tonight was reported spreading over occupied Europe as Adolf Hitler's Gestapo and troops sought to crush an incipient underground revolt extending from Norway's fjords to the mountains of Yugoslavia.

Hitler's gauleiters, ordered to suppress fires of rebellion which might seriously interfere with Axis spring offensive plans, were reported posting decrees threatening wholesale death and imprisonment and even the mass production of whole towns and villages.

Unless the sabotage and both passive and armed resistance ceases, the Nazi leaders threatened the worst reprisals thus far experienced by Europe's shackled millions, according to underground reports.

Threaten "Jap Methods"

One report said that the Nazis, in a warning against further sabotage in Holland, told the Dutch people: "If you continue hostility Japanese methods will be applied."

Gen. George C. Marshall, United States chief of staff, who is holding councils of war in London, was understood to be studying the reports of the underground revolt, which would be of great importance to the Allies' strategic plans.

It was understood that Marshall would confer next week with leaders of the European governments in exile, to determine where support from the people of the occupied countries will be the greatest when the time comes for the Allies to seize the initiative and carry the war back to the continent.

An Allied offensive within the next few months is highly improbable insofar as the western European continent is concerned, and there are some observers who believe that the underground revolt should be held in check and not be allowed to reach its pitch at this time.

Frenchmen Warned

The situation across Europe tonight appeared to be this:

1—The Germans have warned the French population of Prest to be ready for an imminent state of siege, presumably because of fear of British commando or naval attack and the growing strength of the V-army among Frenchmen.

2—Axis forces in Yugoslavia have received orders to make a wholesale roundup of civilians, kill 16,000 hostages and destroy entire towns and villages unless Gen. Draja Michailovic calls off the "spring offensive" of his guerilla forces.

4—Reports reached London of a series of food riots spreading over occupied France. The Vichy radio warned French peasants that "if you hide your wheat France will starve," indicating a peasants' revolt against Germany's seizure of the nation's foodstuffs.

Quisling Cancels Order For Arrest of Clergy

Stockholm, April 11 (AP).—The quisling puppet government of Norway, apparently acting on orders from Berlin, was reported tonight to have canceled orders for the mass arrest tomorrow of rebellious Luthern clergymen.

The 1100 clergymen had resigned in protest against the arrest of Bishop Eivand Berggrav, and three other prominent churchmen. Premier Vidkun Quisling's ultimatum—retract the resignations or be arrested—was to have expired at 2 p. m. today. But when the clergy remained adamant, Quisling, reportedly acting on advice of his German superiors, ordered his church department not to enforce the arrest order. The resignations, he said, were illegal and therefore ineffective, it was reported here.

There was no indication, however, that the bishop was to be freed, and it appeared the move was a tactical one to avoid the anger of the Norwegians that was almost certain to increase if their clergymen were imprisoned.

Instead, it was believed, the Germans, highly experienced in such matters, advised Quisling to accomplish the elimination of faithful ministers individually.

Ex-Worker Held In Defense Plant Sabotage Probe

Baltimore, April 11 (AP).—A former Elkins, W. Va., man was held under $2000 bond for action of a Federal grand jury today after a hearing before United States Commissioner James Cullen on a charge of violating the Federal sabotage statute.

Boyd Stalnaker, 33, told Cullen he didn't know why he plugged fire extinguishers and slashed fire hose while employed in the fire-prevention department of a Baltimore defense plant.

E. A. Soucy, agent in charge of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's office in Baltimore, announced Stalnaker's arrest today.

Soucy said Stalnaker had reported the finding of wooden plugs in several emergency fire extinguishers as possible acts of sabotage while employed at the plant. Altogether 15 hose nozzles were found plugged in such a way that close inspection was necessary to detect the obstructions. Concealed cuts were discovered in three emergency hoses and two 100-foot fire hoses, the agent said.

The agent said Stalnaker denied guilt when he was first questioned, but later admitted he was responsible.

Lifeboat Baby Named for Destroyer Leaves Hospital at Norfolk

Associated Press Photos

STRONG AND HEALTHY—Jesse Roper Mohorovicic, 13 days old, whose mother named him for a rescuing destroyer after his birth in a lifeboat, yesterday spent his first day away from the hospital at Norfolk. Left—The hospital weighing-out, slightly less than 8 pounds. Top center—It's an ever-changing world. Right—Visna, his 2-year-old sister, gets a greeting. Bottom center—The happy family group. Jesse Roper was born while 15-foot waves tossed the lifeboat which took his mother, Mrs. Joseph Mohorovicic, off a torpedoed ship. He was delivered by a doctor who was suffering from two cracked ribs. A piece of canvas sheltered the delivery in the crowded boat. The family returned to their home in New York yesterday by train

Toiling Natives, Plodding Camels Keep British Air Supply Routes Open in African Wastes

By the Associated Press

An Army flier of the Air Force ferry command reported yesterday that thousands of "half-naked African natives" and heavily laden camels are playing a vital part in keeping American long-range bombers moving to distant fighting fronts.

Maj. Geoffrey Bonnell said the natives and camels had made it possible to convert a string of small British air fields into a route across jungle and desert which the big bombers could use in shuttling to the Middle East and southwest Pacific.

"Four months with the ferry command in Africa and the Middle East shows you much of this war has to be won on the ground before it can be won in the air," Bonnell said in the Army Air Force's news letter.

"The ground is being won," he continued. "Airdromes are building up, supplies are coming in, and communications are much improved since we set up the first ferry command base in the Middle East last winter.

Needed Big Airdromes

"There were service stations across Africa when we started, but they were British stations used only for ferrying single-engine ships. The British shuttled the fighters on short hops in squadrons. The bulk of their bombers had to be based on the isles to carry the war to Germany, so the British weren't ferrying big planes and had no need for large airdromes.

"We could use the British stations for forced landings, but to push the big four-motored jobs you need airdromes with plenty of length to the runways. We use the brakes as little as possible to save the linings.

"Existing runways had to be made longer and their foundations strengthened. New runways and new foundations had to be built. For this work natives are used. I have seen hundreds of half-naked African natives carrying crushed foundation stone in buckets balanced on their heads.

"Desert sand has a habit of seeping into your engines while your ship is being warmed up, so concrete platforms had to be built. We use the engines as little as possible on the ground.

Lands Oil Companies

"Planning ahead for fuel is one of our biggest tasks, and the oil companies engaged in the work have done a splendid job in filling our needs. Fueling was done entirely from tin cans when we started. We travel light on fuel, carrying just enough for each trip, and we plan to use it carefully. Save on fuel and you gain on cargo space. And cargo space is gold when it holds tools and spare parts.

"At one desert airdrome they had to employ a thousand camels in addition to desert trucks to keep up with the increasing demand for fuel. Each of the big lumbering animals brought in 35 gallons of fuel in cans."

Bonnell commented that the African landscape wasn't ideal country for forced landings, adding: "flying miles of jungle 50 feet up. I've seen a natural zoo, with lions, elephants, antelopes and all the main attractions."

"We wear summer uniforms topped by pith helmets in which the boys all want their pictures taken, and we are fast adopting shorts. Not that it is hot—a mere 120 degrees when I left. But you get a dry heat over there and it does cool off at night. The heat doesn't seem to affect the engines, but it can affect the men, and keeping fit is important," he said.

War of Deliverance Is New Suggestion

Camden, Ark., April 11 (AP).—Repeating the Lord's prayer while driving his car enabled former Congressman John McClellan to suggest a name for the war to President Roosevelt, who has been pondering the subject.

The phrase "and deliver us from evil" caused McClellan to telegraph the President proposing "the war of deliverance" as a name.

Charles Evans Hughes Marks 80th Birthday

New York, April 11 (AP).—In the company of his three children and nine grandchildren, Charles Evans Hughes, former Chief Justice of the United States, celebrated his eightieth birthday quietly today.

Since he stepped down from the Supreme Court bench last July 1, Hughes has spent his time in traveling and living quietly in his Washington home.

Sidelights of the War

Bulgarian Cabinet Resigns In Protest to Helping Hitler

By the Associated Press

Bern, Switzerland, April 11.—The Bulgarian government resigned today following refusal of a majority to approve Hitler's program for the Balkan nation—believed in diplomatic quarters here to call for active participation in the war against Russia or Turkey or both.

Premier Bogdan Philoff immediately formed a new cabinet in Sofia with only two of his former ministers represented. This was taken to indicate that the other seven had opposed German proposals handed to King Boris in Berlin two weeks ago.

Nazi Airports in Bulgaria

Istanbul, Turkey, April 11 (AP).—The Germans have completed 50 to 60 new military airports in Bulgaria—some of them only a few minutes flying time from Turkey—and the Nazis now are convinced the neighboring country is satisfactory for use as an advanced air base, a recently arrived skilled observer reported today.

This informant said he did not believe there was any immediate threat to Turkey, however, because of a German lack of planes, crewmen and fuel. He added that training of new Bulgarian pilots and advanced courses for others have been halted by a shortage of gasoline.

'Laugh, Clown, Laugh'

Manchester, England, April 11 (U.P.).—Beatrice Lillie remembered the pain in the hearts of a "million other mothers" today and went on with her clowning—and hoping that somehow, her son, reported missing in action in the Indian Ocean, might turn up safe.

She wowed them last night with a burlesque of Carmen Miranda singing "The South American Way," while in a drawer of her dressing ing table backstage there was a crumpled, curtly sympathetic telegram advising her that Sir Robert Peel, 21, ordinary seaman, was missing and apparently lost.

Before she went on to do her turn she pinned a note to the cast on the bulletin board of the Manchester Opera House, where the new revue, "Big Top," has been a great success largely because of her starring role. The note asked that no one say anything to her about the tragedy.

Then she went on stage and the audience roared with laughter as Bea Lillie mimicked the hip-twitching delivery of the Brazilian songstress.

Miscalculation

Los Angeles, April 11 (AP).—That unfinished basement at C. W. Atkins' house seemed as natural as an air raid shelter.

So Atkins, in his spare time, dug it deeper and wider. He was about ready to cement the whole thing in.

But it rained the other day.

Today there was a lurch. Furniture slid across the rooms and one end of the house dropped—right into the shelter.

In the middle 1930's, in Nazi Germany, more than a million members of the Hitler Youth organizations were building model airplanes in the primary schools. More than 100,000 older boys were in gliding and soaring camps. The result was the mighty Luftwaffe.

In 1939 the Civil Aeronautics Administration launched its program for civilian pilot training with 317 students in 13 selected colleges and universities. This was a test program.

After the fall of France, Congress gave the CAA the money to greatly expand this program.

"All told," Assistant Secretary Hinckley said recently, "we have taught almost 75,000 young Americans to fly. Some 15,000 of them are now flying for the Army and the Navy."

Now the War Department has announced that the entire pilot training facilities of the CAA will be devoted to the war program under a plan worked out with the Army Air Forces. Forty-five thousand students will be put through the elementary training course each year and 31,000 mechanics will be trained each year.

Hinkley is proud of all that, but he is far from satisfied.

Started "Wrong End" To

"Because we started late," he says, "we had to begin our training courses at the college level. But that was to start at the 'wrong end to.' Instruction in the rudiments of aviation should begin in the elementary and secondary schools . . .

"All children, even the youngest, are interested in planes and what makes them go. More than three million youngsters are now building and flying model airplanes, largely out of school.

"We feel that this interest should be channeled into the school to give interesting content to all kinds of courses—to arithmetic, to algebra and geometry, to physics and manual training courses, to geography, history, economics, biology, chemistry, drawing and almost any subject you can name.

"The world is changing every day under the influence of the airplane. Every student, whether boy or girl, should know the why and wherefore in order to have a clear understanding of his or her environment and the major forces shaping it . . .

More Than Air-Minded

"To be air-minded is not enough. Something more is needed if the United States is to be a nation on wings, which it is surely going to be. This and succeeding generations must become what I call 'air-conditioned.'

"When I say 'air-conditioned,' I mean that we must become conditioned to the air and the machines of the air in just the same way that we are conditioned to the ground and the machines of the ground. It implies knowledge from the use of our hands, our legs, our eyes and ears, our whole body, and not merely our minds and imagination.

"We have got to get the 'feel' of the air and the airplane into our bones, so to speak. Today we pilot an automobile along the ground as easily as we walk, with as little conscious thought or effort.

"We must learn to pilot an airplane through the air with the same sure, almost automatic responses. We must acquire an instinctive sense of what it can and can't do. We must learn to fly without having to stop and think what we're going to do next. We must get to feel thoroughly at home in the air."

Industry Is Beanstalking

The CAA, Assistant Secretary Hinckley points out, is well designed now to serve our immediate war needs. But it also is designed, he emphasizes, to serve our long-term peacetime needs as well.

"The aviation industry," he says, "is growing like Jack's beanstalk. It has skyrocketed until it is second only to steel. What is going to happen to this gigantic industry when peace comes?

"It doesn't take any remarkable clairvoyance to see that the next few decades will be dominated by the airplane as recnet decades have been by the automobile. We shall have great transport airlines carrying passengers and freight. All first-class mail will be airmail. Feeder lines will hook up smaller cities. There will be pick-up service in the villages.

"In addition, we shall have hundreds of thousands of small family planes. Cheap and safe, they probably will be powered with two small motors and equipped to come down on either land or water."

But that, Hinckley recently told a gathering at Columbia University, is for the future. Right now, he said, the major job is to provide the Army and Navy with clouds of planes and skilled pilots to fly them.

"If we have learned anything from the tragic events of recent year," he said, "It should be this—that for every nation in the world today, it is now a question of fly or die."

Voters Don't Know Their Legislators

beginning to warm up, and that when candidates for reelection mount the hustings, their names will undoubtedly become better known to constituents than is the case at present.

Today's study found that farmers, and residents of small towns, are the best informed as to the name and background of their Congressman. Nearly seven out of every ten farmers can, for example, give the correct name of their Representative, as compared to only about one out of every four voters in cities over 500,000.

"Do you happen to know the name of the Congressman from your district?"

The results for the Nation and for various areas and groups are shown below. They apply only to members of the House of Representatives, not to Senators:

	Able to Give Name	Unable to
National Average	50%	50%

South Stands Out

It is noteworthy that, among the sections, the South stands out as the one with the largest number able to identify their Congressmen.

The study also found that more Republicans than Democrats could name the Representative from their district. A notable lack of information on this point was found in the low income groups, of whom only 40 per cent could name their Congressmen in contrast to 63 per cent among upper income voters.

The study also found that a much higher ratio of Americans can correctly give the party affiliation of their Congressmen than can give his name. Farmers were best informed on this point, and big-city voters least informed.

One of the biggest political question marks in the 1942 campaign is what attitude the voters will take toward Congressmen who opposed war in the period prior to Pearl Harbor.

Don't Know Stand

The first consideration is, of course, whether voters know what stand their Congressman took on the issue. The institute placed on its ballot a question designed to probe this point. The question was:

"Before America entered the war, was your Congressman in favor of entering the war or of staying out?"

Results show that 65 per cent of all voters say they do not know what position their Congressman took, while 35 per cent say they do.

The latter group—the ones who know how their Congressman stood on war—were then asked: "Would you like to see him reelected?"

The replies reveal this interesting fact: Among persons who say their Congressman favored war before Pearl Harbor, sentiment runs 4 to 1 in favor of reelecting him. Among persons who say their Congressman was against war before Pearl Harbor, the ratio in favor of reelections is considerably smaller—about 3 to 2.

Primary Next Week

The first primary of the 1942 Congressional campaign is scheduled in Illinois next week, and from then on the campaign will begin in earnest.

The big question is: will the Democratic Party lose seats in the House, and if so how many? Some of the more optimistic Republican leaders believe that the Democratic majority in the House can be sharply reduced if not wiped out altogether.

A preview of public sentiment on the Congressional campaign, based on an extensive survey by the Institute, will be published next week. It will show how many seats the Democrats would gain or lose if election were held today, and it will probe other aspects of the political situation.

Nazi Probe Calls Rep. Hoffman

volved in operations uncovered by The Post in a long investigation, which brought out apparent evidence of a conspiracy which reached into the Capital.

The oddly parallel utterances and editorial unanimity of certain obscure, Jew-baiting publications suggested enemy inspiration, perhaps control.

Some of the editors and their aides were summoned last week, but not heard—due to proceedings which got one of them three months for contempt of court, the nabbing of a prowler outside the guarded grand jury chamber and other delays.

So, when Representative Hoffman goes to the Municipal Court Building tomorrow "to give evidence in behalf of the United States," he will find quite a company waiting to be examined.

One of them will be Charles B. Hudson, 50, who puts out an anti-British, anti-Jewish bulletin with the slogan, "End the War Quickly."

Hoffman made a speech January 27 in which he called President Roosevelt a "Judas," afterward ordering 145,000 reprints from the Government Printing Office. Hoffman sent some of these copies to Hudson, who mailed out the speech from Omaha, Nebr., in the same envelope with a seditious card and a sheaf of Jew-baiting dodgers.

Justice Jennings Bailey of the District Court sent Hudson to jail for three months for refusing to tell who printed the seditious card. Allowed 10 days to change his mind and talk, Hudson went back to the grand jury room the next day, but spent the weekend in jail just the same.

Attorney George E. Sullivan—author of an anti-Jewish book which Hudson offers for sale—in the same bulletin which offers 28 of the Hoffman speeches for 10 cents—declared yesterday that he was not Hudson's lawyer, as Hudson had said.

Kissenger May Be There

Another who may greet Hoffman at the grand jury chambers is Hermann D. Kissenger, who perhaps will thank the Congressman for sending him several hundred copies of the "Roosevelt Is a Judas" speech, about a month ago.

A Kansas City lawyer, Kissenger used to write for the Bund paper, "Deutscher Weckruf und Beobachter." He was arrested for sedition—"giving aid and comfort to the enemy"—last December 17, but was released a few days later.

Hoffman will find another recipient—of several thousand copies of his speech, in Mrs. David Stanley, Cleveland—who presided two weeks ago at a meeting where handbills blaming the war on the President and calling him a traitor were given out.

Still another distributor of the "Roosevelt is a Judas" speech who is scheduled to be at the same session as the grim, isolationist orator who made it, is Gerald B. Winrod, of Wichita, Kans. A fluent speaker who was called the "jayhawk Hitler" when he ran for the Senate in 1938, Winrod damns with equal venom the President, the British and the Jews. Winrod got several hundred copies of the speech.

It seemed likely that Foreman John S. Gorrell and his fellow grand jurors would wish to ask Hoffman how he came to send his reprints to these and dozens of others, of like views and activities.

Whether they asked for them, and what, if anything, they paid the Congressman for their share of the 145,000 reprints also are questions of interest.

Likened to Hill

Hoffman's name first came into the inquiry ten days ago, when his secretary, Miss Helen Boyer, was summoned. It came out in the trial of the German agent, Viereck, that Miss Boyer authorized use of Hoffman's frank on 30,000 copies of an isolationist speech bought by Representative Hamilton Fish's secretary, George Hill, a year ago. Hill was the Capitol Hill purchasing agent for Viereck's Nazi propaganda machine.

After Miss Boyer was summoned, Hoffman issued a statement that the Administration was using the special grand jury to "smear" him. He recalled that on January 22 he assumed responsibility for what his secretary did.

Until mid-March, Prosecutor Maloney's work was shared by Special Prosecutor Edward J. Hickey, jr., who is now a Navy officer. Certified last week as Maloney's associate was John T. M. Reddan, 32-year-old graduate of Georgetown University and also of its College of Law.

Reddan has been with the Department of Justice since 1935, working in the criminal division since April, 1936.

Married, with two [illegible], he lives at Woodacres, Md.

Nazis Have Lost Rule of Air, Says Soviet President

Moscow, April 11 (AP).—President Michael Kalinin declared today in an article appearing in the government newspaper Izvestia that between two million and three million Germans were "put out of action" on the front during the winter because of frostbite.

He said the Don Basin was gradually being freed and that "sooner than the Germans think" coal from there will be supplying Russian industry.

The Germans no longer have mastery of the air, he said, having been compelled to use planes to protect their armed forces rather than for attack.

The U. S. S. R. President estimated the tank strength of both sides was about equal since Russia had reduced the German lead. The Soviet infantry and artillery he pronounced far superior to the German.

Social Justice Still Pleads Nazis' Cause

(Editor's note.—Scores of verminous little sheets, each with a few thousand readers, are gnawing away at the faith and unity of our people, whispering defeat and clamoring about "freedom of the press." Their common policy—"made in Germany"—is to turn Americans against one another, and to split America from the United Nations. This is the fifth article of a series about these papers.)

By Dillard Stokes
Post Staff Writer

Out of the black fog of depression crawled a crew of bitter fanatics and greedy opportunists, to inflame and divide the people. Some of them have hung on, to plague the Government and endanger the Nation amid the trials of war.

One of these tenacious agitators is Charles E. Coughlin of Royal Oak, Mich. A learned, brilliant man—with a venomous tongue, a sanctimonious manner and bottomless capacity for hatred.

Coughlin founded a magazine, Social Justice, which cunningly pleads the Axis case and undermines the war effort.

When our troops went to Ulster, Social Justice proclaimed: "United States Invades Ireland."

Links Britain and Japan

The magazine described Great Britain last December 22, as a country with the same objectives as Japan.

A few weeks later, on February 2, the publication swung to the tack, "Yellow-White Race War May Be Next." This was to give point to an attack on President Roosevelt's conduct of the war, helping China fight Japan.

Like other papers of the same stripe, Social Justice depicts England as a Jewish-dominated ally not to be trusted. The article headed, "Dissension Threatens British Fighting Forces," breathed delight between every other line.

The worst Social Justice has to say of Japan at Pearl Harbor is that the American Government gave Japan only a "lame excuse" for the attack.

Blames Jews for War

Of blame for the war, Social Justice says, "guilt for the present war belongs to the Jews."

This magazine does its Jew-baiting with more style and polish than its contemporaries of the vermin press. But there is no more of charity in Social Justice than in X-Ray or Publicity.

Hitler was forced to persecute the Jews because they had become the "aristocrats of Germany," says Social Justice.

"Will the American people want to listen to reason and terminate a war which no one can win completely, and which Americans can lose completely?" asks Social Justice saying, "we will leave that answer to the Jews. . . ."

Not Speaking for Church

Yet, says the magazine, it is doing the Jews a favor, because if it stopped publishing, there would be pogroms in America!

Coughlin currently claims he is "no longer" associated with the weekly, which has carried his characteristic literary style in an unbroken stream. Ownership of the bulk of the stock in Social Justice Publishing Co., has been transferred—to Coughlin's aged parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Coughlin.

This man Coughlin is a priest of the Catholic Church. But prelates of the church again and again—most lately three days ago—have spelled out the declaration that they neither share nor condone his hatreds. Agitator Coughlin does not speak for the Church.

"Social Justice is . . . not a Catholic paper . . . the Archdiocese of Detroit has no responsibility, direct or indirect, for Social Justice magazine," said a formal statement last Thursday from the chancellor of the archdiocese, Msgr. Edward J. Hickey.

Msgr. Hickey's statement was nationally distributed by the National Catholic Welfare Council news service. Among the papers presenting the statement in full was the Catholic Review, diocesan publication of Washington and Baltimore.

open restricted residential districts to operation of boarding and rooming houses would be among the measures upon which he would ask the committee to act during the next week. He will announce Monday a date for the committee meeting.

His bill, intended to increase the supply of rooms for Government workers, would remove the present four-person limit on the numbers of roomers in houses in restricted areas, so long as fire regulations are observed. The four-roomer limit was fixed last December by the District Zoning Commission in permitting home owners in restricted residential areas to take in roomers and boarders for the emergency.

"The prevention of inflation involves not only the freezing of prices but it also involves a comprehensive tax program," O'Mahoney said. "The longer we delay in adopting both of these policies, the greater will be the difficulty because we'll be constantly confronted with legislative riders directed toward the same end."

Meantime, the Office of Emergency Management, over-all war agency under President Roosevelt, issued a memorandum warning that the United States might lose the war unless inflation is controlled.

In joining the battle against rising prices, the OEM said:

"Either we control inflation, either we stop the runaway, or we risk losing this war and with it everything the United States of America means to us all."

New Bombing Season Near For Chungking

By the Associated Press

Chungking, April 11.—The good fog, the blessed murk which for seven months has protected Free China's capital from bombs, will lite in a few weeks, and Chungking must be ready again for the ordeal by blast and fire.

They call it the "bombing season"—last year it opened May 3 and closed August 31. It was marked by a week-long siege of horror which began August 7 and in which the city was under almost constant alert, without light or telephone service, with the water supply disrupted and the food growing scarce. The blitz was intended to make the Free Chinese cry for peace, and in this it failed completely.

This year the Japanese bombers are assembling at Hankow, the once great Yangtze port, used since 1938 as the main springboard for air attack on Chungking.

This year Chungking is getting ready for anything. An anti-gas corps of 3000 has been organized. It will go into action at the throb of great drums if gas bombs are dropped. Special anti-gas observation posts have been built, and already many of the city's dugouts have been equipped with anti-gas screens.

Lecturers have told the people what to do if there is gas. Simple mouth masks are being sold and warnings are being issued against walking barefoot, as most of the poorer Chinese do.

There are roughly 700,000 people here now, but at least 200,000 of them are expected to leave before the bombing season starts.

Public and private dugouts will be able to accommodate some 350,000. Thus there will not be room for everyone, even with the usual exodus. Consequently, the authorities have ordered everyone without a proper domicile permit to leave Chungking, and if they do not do by April 15, they may be arrested and imprisoned.

Kann's Displays 'War Windows'

Twelve windows displays, dramatizing "We the People at War," were on exhibition yesterday in the south show windows of Kann's Department Store, Eighth and Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest.

The series of displays—made up of posters, photographs, paintings and models—illustrates America's role in the war, emphasizing the part which the United States civilian can play in the struggle.

Exhibits include a graphic portrayal of the salvage campaigns, a large scale reproduction of the Bill of Rights and a dramatization of the "battle of the production lines," centered by three smokestacks towering symbolically over a trio of artillery muzzles.

Chinese Killed As Mutineer On British Ship

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—Mutiny aboard a British merchantman in New York harbor today resulted in death for a Chinese seaman and the arrest of 11 others of the same nationality.

The ship was unnamed because of war restrictions.

Shore leave had been denied the Chinese members of the crew and they brooded.

Today they suddenly advanced en masse on the master with marlin spikes and lengths of pipe. When the ensuing scuffle had subsided, Ling Young Chai, 29, of Foochow, China, lay dead in the captain's cabin, a bullet hole in his head.

First Officer William Robert Cherry, 39, of Wenatchee, Wash., suffered hand gashes when one of the Chinese lunged at him with a sharp marlin spike.

The 6-foot captain, Hilton Bowe, 60, of Orchard Cottage, Chatton, Northumberlandshire, England, told police that he was conferring in his cabin with Cherry when the dozen Chinese entered, led by Ling.

"Ling," he told Lieut. Detective Maurice Gaughran, "had a marlin spike in his hand and demanded shore leave. His crew mates jabbered excitedly in half-broken English and Chinese.

"I ordered them from the cabin and told them to see me later. They closed in and I drew my pistol. I said the next man who advanced a step would be shot dead.

"Ling came on and my first officer grappled with him. In the Melee Cherry's hands were badly lacerated. The others closed in and Ling then made for me. I shot once."

White members of the crew heard the shot and came running to the captain's quarters. They subdued the 11 Chinese and locked them below decks.

A waterfront riot call brought 75 policemen in radio cars, detective squad cars, by marine launch and afoot.

Later Bowe was booked on a technical charge of homicide and held without bail for arraignment in felony court. The 11 Chinese seamen were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct.

Police and Fire Officers, Men To Get Medals

For heroic service performed in smoke and flame and in the face of exploding guns, two lieutenants—one of the Fire Department and one of the Police Department—and two police privates have been selected to be awarded medals for meritorious service during the fiscal year of 1941.

They are Lieut. John R. Jefferies, No. 12 Precinct, gold medal; Private Glenville F. Brown, traffic division, silver medal; Private Richard W. Mower, No. 9 Precinct, bronze bar, and Lieut. Andrew N. Wright, No. 2 Truck Company, bronze bar.

About the middle of June, 1940, Lieut. Jefferies was standing in the lobby of his precinct when Sergt. Charles F. Cummins, jr., was fatally shot by Private Otho L. Blackwell, who with his revolver in hand rushed from the rear door of the building.

Tackled Fleeing Man

Jefferies, "apparently without a single thought of the danger to which he was exposed," rushed after the fleeing policeman and tackled him with such force that both fell to the floor of the garage. Blackwell's gun went off in the struggle wounding himself in the head, an injury from which he later died.

The committee's report stated: "There is no doubt if Lieut. Jefferies had not acted as quick as he did and displayed such courageous action, Blackwell would have caused more difficulty and additional serious trouble if he had not been so quickly captured."

Pvt. Glenville F. Brown, awarded the silver medal, was on duty Sunday afternoon October 6, 1940, in the vicinity of Thirteenth and F Streets Northwest. Pvt. Harrell Reagan was with him. They were approached by C. F. Bell, manager of a nearby restaurant which had just been held up by two white men.

The two privates started in pursuit and soon caught up with a truck in which three white men were riding. Reagan approached one side of the truck and Brown the other. One of the men pulled a gun and attempted to fire twice at Reagan. The gun did not go off because Brown quickly put his finger between the hammer and the firing pin of the weapon. The three men were captured and a number of holdups by the same three men were solved.

Saved Many in Blaze

Private Mower was awarded the bronze bar for a service he performed March 2, 1941, when he was told of a fire a short distance from No. 9 Precinct. Running to the building he aroused some of the occupants and made his way through the smoke to the street.

Outside he was told one more person was in the blazing building. The policeman returned to the second floor and carried out Frank A. Zugel, 46. Mower was partially overcome by smoke but was revived on the scene and carried on with his duties.

A bronze bar was awarded to Lieut. Wright for rescuing a woman from a burning building February 5, 1941. With his company he responded to a fire in a three-story building. The lieutenant accompanied by Private Bernard J. Burns, who received honorable mention, went to the top floor of the burning building and rescued Nina Knott, who was unconscious in bed.

The following men received honorable mention: Fire Department, Capt. Leiper F. Price, Private Wilbur S. Ratcliffe, both of No. 11 Engine Company; Lieut. William H. Ronan, No. 19 Engine Company, and Private Bernard J. Burn, No. 2 Truck Company. Police Department, Private John G. Michalek and Private George F. Bryant, both of No. 6 Precinct.

Formal award of the medals will be made at the Board of Trade dinner in the Mayflower in April 23.

Ickes and Hill Recommend CCC Be Maintained to Do Spade Work for Army

Continuation of the Civilian Conservation Corps program as one which is contributing materially to the American war effort was recommended to Congress yesterday by Secretary of Interior Harold Ickes and Acting Secretary of Agriculture Grover B. Hill.

Their recommendations were sent in separate letters to Chairman Thomas of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, in answer to his request for their views on the bill to abolish the CCC and the National Youth Administration, sponsored by Senator McKellar (Democrat) of Tennessee.

Hearings to Reopen Tuesday

Hearings on the measure will be resumed at 10:30 a. m. in Room 318 of the Senate Office Building. At that time, Senator McKellar said yesterday, he will present two witnesses, Dr. Ben H. Henthorn, president of the Kansas City (Mo.) College of Commerce, and Dr. George S. Benson, president of Harding College in Searcy, Ark.

Ickes said that the help of the CCC is still needed for the conservation and improvement of agricultural lands, and of western ranges producing meat, wool and leather essential to war. He also warned of the danger of forest fires, especially in coastal regions, and said that CCC boys trained in fire fighting could help reduce this hazard.

Aiding Army

Both Hill and Ickes pointed out that CCC enrollees in many camps are working exclusively on army reservations, while Ickes said that some CCC campers have helped build rest centers for soldiers, have worked on lookout stations and communication lines essential to military operations.

Hill suggested that provisions should be made, in this time of labor shortages, to release or furlough CCC boys for private employment, particularly in agriculture. CCC officials pointed out that 3500 boys had been furloughed last year for this purpose, and that the furlough plan is being used again this year.

Text of Cripps' Farewell Broadcast to India

By the Associated Press

New Delhi, India, April 11.—Sir Stafford Cripps, in a farewell radio broadcast to the people of India, said today:

"You will have heard that the draft declaration which I brought to India in behalf of the war cabinet and which I explained to you the last time I spoke over the wireless has been rejected by your leaders.

"I am sad that this great opportunity of rallying India for her defense and her freedom has been missed.

"No one could have been more fully conscious than I of the great difficulties which history has placed in the way of settlement of relations between the British and the Indian peoples and even more between the different communities in India.

"The war cabinet, in sending me on this mission, realized to the full that Indian opinion — though united in a desire for full self-government—was widely disunited as to the methods by which it should be attained. It was with these differences of view that we had to deal and it would have been no use if we had closed our eyes to the hard realities of the situation.

"In the past, British governments have been accused of using vague terms to cloak lack of purpose, and when they stated that it must be left to the Indian communities to agree among themselves it has been said that this was the only device by which Great Britain might indefinitely retain its control over India.

"But the Congress since the outbreak of the war has repeatedly demanded two essentials as a basis for its support of the Allied effort in the war—first, a delaration of Indian independence and second, a constituent assembly to frame a new and free constitution for India.

Draft Covers Both Demands

"Both of these demands find their place in the draft declaration. It was in the light of the demands and the criticism of Indian leaders that the war cabinet drafted their declaration with the object of convincing the Indian peoples and world public opinion of the sincerity of their desire to offer freedom to India at the earliest practicable moment.

"To avoid complaints that had been made in the past, they put out a clear and precise plan which should avoid all possibility of Indian self-government being held up by the views of some large section or community. But they left it open for the Indian leaders to agree upon an alternative method if they wished.

"Of course, every individual and organization would have liked to draft a declaration to express his or their point of view, forgetting that if it did it would have inevitably been rejected by the others.

"The war cabinet were thus in a position rather like an arbitrator who tries to arrange a fair compromise between conflicting points of view. They could not, however, without denying the very freedom which they were offering, impose a form of government upon peoples which they did not themselves freely choose.

"Criticism has been showered on the scheme from all sides; parties and individuals vied one from another in competition to discover the greatest number of defects.

Sees Compromise Only Hope

"But in all this spate of criticism those vital parts of the document with which all agree have never been mentioned. Full and free self-government for India—that is its central feature.

"This critical and unconstructive attitude, natural enough in the law courts in the market place, is not the best way of arriving at a compromise, but compromise there must be if a strong and free India is to come into being.

"Some day, somehow, great communities and parties in India will have to agree upon a method of framing their new constitution.

"I regret profoundly for the sake of India, for whom I have deep and admiring friendship, that the opportunity now offered has not been accepted.

"But all this concerns the future. The immediate difficulties have been as regards the present.

"First, there was difficulty as to defense. Upon that the attitude of the British government was very simple.

"For many decades the defense of India has been in charge of His Majesty's Government. That charge has been carried out for over 20 years by the commander in cheif, who is also defense member in the Viceroy's Executive Council.

"This led to an organization which places control of the armed forces under the defense secretariat, headed by the commander in chief. Army in India, containing British and India units, the navy and air force, all come under this supreme command.

"A demand has been made that the defense of India should be placed in Indian hands. No one suggests that the commander in chief, as head of the armed forces, should be under the Indian government but they say his functions as a defense member should be transferred to an Indian.

Cites Difficulties Involved

"This may sound simple. It would mean long and difficult reorganization of the whole defense secretariat—an unscrambling of eggs scrambled many years ago—which would cause delay and confusion at the very moment when the enemy is at the gates and maximum speed and efficiency are essential in defense.

"It is the duty of the British government to defend India and our duty to our American Allies, who are giving such valuable help, makes such a course impossible.

"To show our complete sincerity and desire to give representative Indian members on the executive council the maximum power, we offered to create a new war department, which would take over governmental relations of commander in chiefs, general headquarters and naval and air headquarters and which would be in his charge as war member, leaving the rest of defense—a department with a number of the most important functions added—to the Indian defense member.

"This arrangement satisfied some of the parties but not the Congress, who demanded a degree of control for the Indian defense member which might have greatly jeopardized the Allied war effort in India.

"In the wider area of defense, which touches almost every department of the Raj, the administration would have been wholly under the control of representative Indians.

"But none of these things were the real cause of the breakdown in negotiations.

Two Suggestions Offered

"In their final letter addressed to me, the Congress working committee stated that the temporary form of government envisaged during the war was not such as to enable them to join the government.

"They have two suggestions to remedy the situation: First, an immediate change of constitution—a point raised at the last moment and one that everyone else admitted to be wholly impracticable while the war was proceeding; and second, that they are prepared to enter in a true national government with a cabinet of Indian leaders untrammelled by any control by the viceroy or the British cabinet.

"Realize what this means. Government for an indefinite period by a set of persons nominated by Indian parties responsible to no legislature or electorate, incapable of being changed and a majority of whom would be in a position to dominate large minorities.

"It is easy to understand that great minorities in India would never accept such a system. Nor could His Majesty's government, who have given pledges to those minorities, consent to their being placed unprotected while the existing constitution lasts under a simple and possibly inimical majority rule.

"It would be a breach of all the pledges that we have given. Such a solution may sound simple and attractive to those who have no knowledge of the deep, communal divisions in India, but it is in fact wholly impracticable and would never be accepted by very large sections of the Indian peoples.

Unity Is Greatest Need

"The Congress suggested that without these changes they cannot give a lead to the Indian people.

"The essential need of India today is for all leaders of all main togethner in a single national govparties and communities to come ernment.

"A scheme that attracts some and repels others, such as the Congress has suggested, is of little value. Nor does the precise form matter so greatly.

"Inspiration and leadership are not to be found in form or conventions; they will be demonstrated by combined purpose and unity of action.

"No constitution and no convention will work unless those who lead the people will come together with a common determination to make it work. Had the Congress leaders felt themselves able to join with other leaders who were willing, then indeed a great work ought to have been accomplished.

"One thing I must make clear. I alone in India carry the responsibility for what has been done.

"Neither the viceroy nor the commander in chief carries any responsibility for these negotiations. They have throughout done their utmost to help me and I express to them and many other willing helpers of all nationalities my sincerest thanks for that help.

Distrust Proves Too Strong

"We have tried by the offer that I brought to help India along her road to victory and freedom. But for the moment, past distrust has proved too strong to allow present agreement.

"But in that failure to achieve immediate results there is no bitterness. Our effort has been genuine. No responsible Indian has questioned the sincerity of our main purpose—complete freedom for India.

"Such an effort inspired by goodwill and sincerity will leave its mark upon the history of our relations and will cast its beneficent light forward into the future—it will prove to have been the first step along the path of freedom for India and of friendship between our two countries.

"We may differ as to the method by which that freedom can best be reached, both now and in the future. But upon one thing surely we must all be agreed—that it cannot be reached through fresh conquest of India by a power such as Japan, that has shown itself brutal and intolerant to its Asiatic sister nations.

"It is only necessary to visit Formosa or the occupied parts of China, as I have done, to know that through Japanese conquest misery and starvation will come.

What Japanese Rule Means

"The widely advertised propaganda of the Japanese, painting themselves as the liberators of China, has resulted in nothing but untold suffering and tragedy to hundreds of honest and peaceful Chinese men, women and children.

"The same propaganda now being made to trick the Indian people into submission holds out for them no better prospect than the dire suffering which has been inflicted upon their Chinese neighbors.

"The hour has struck when India herself is being driven inexorably by the aggression of Japan into the front line of defense in a war which now spreads its evil tentacles into nearly every country of the world.

"We shall do our utmost despite all our heavy commitments elsewhere, and the United States will lend her great growing aid as well as to assist the Indians in the defense of their country. We ask them to help us as we seek to help them.

"The vast resources of manufacture of the United States, of Great Britain, of Russia, matched to the unlimited manpower of the Allied Nations, can bring but one result—final victory. And toward that victory India can and must play her part.

Risks Must Be Taken

"The common peoples of the world will have opportunities in world resettlement such as they have never had before and the Indian people and their leaders must make ready to play their full part in the building of world order.

"Risks must be taken: innovations must be tried; and we must climb quickly out of the ruts of peacetime habits and customs. A new tempo is needed, new devotion, and a more total effort to finish quickly with the horrors of war.

"I have seen that efforts are being made in the Soviet Union. I have witnessed, too, the Chinese, ill-equipped, lacking many of the essential supplies, indomitably carrying on their defense year after year and wearing down the aggressor who has penetrated deep into their homeland.

"Now is the time for India and her people to join their courage, their strength, and their endurance in the great heroic and world-wide army of common people and to take her part in those smashing blows for victory against brutality and aggression which shall forever free the masses from the age-long fear and tragedy of poverty and of war."

Statement to Press On Indian Negotiations

The text of a press statement by Sir Stafford Cripps on Indian negotiations:

I have now received replies from all the principal parties and communities to whom I submitted the draft of a declaration of His Majesty's Government.

Negotiations have been prolonged in the case of the (All-India) Congress only.

There have been many meetings and a number of formulae and suggestions, especially upon the question of a defense minister.

After a very lengthy deliberation, the outcome of which seemed uncertain from day to day, I received the reply of the Congress in the form of a letter at 7 p. m. last night.

It made it clear that the working committee (of the Congress) was not prepared to accept the scheme or to enter a national government.

As a result of this and other answers I have had most regretfully to advise His Majesty's Government that there was not the necessary acceptance of their proposals such as to justify their making a declaration in the form of the draft.

The draft is, therefore, withdrawn and we revert to the position as it was before I came out here, though not quite perhaps to that position.

No Rancor in Disagreement

Discussions and negotiations have been carried on in the most frank and friendly spirit on all sides.

We have acknowledged the general sincerity of this spirit and although we must far the moment agree to differ there is no rancor in our disagreement.

Sometimes in the heat and excitement of discussion and argument we are apt to overlook the area of agreement.

There is a large and very important area of agreement as to the future freedom of India. I do not propose to go into details of many arguments that have been made.

I have heard and spoken enough of these over the last three weeks and I will say a word about this over the radio tonight.

I shall be leaving New Delhi on my return journey on Sunday morning.

I want to first thank you all for your help and then I want to ask you to continue that help, not to me but to India.

The discussions are over. They will slip back into history and they will leave their impress, a good, clear and healthy impress which will influence the future. But the present and future press upon us and must be faced.

Urges All Help for India

India is threatened. All who love India as I love India and you love India must bring their energies, each in his own way, to her immediate help. That help cannot come through dissension and differences. It must come by a joining together of vital elements into a closely knit unity. This is your task where you can help, whatever your party or community.

We have tried our best to agree. We have failed. Never mind whose fault it is. Let me take all the blame, if that will help in uniting India for her own defense.

Great Britain will do her utmost.

America is doing all she can and now India must devote herself wholeheartedly, with special effort in every field of activity, in defending her soil and protecting her women and children from those ghastly horrors that have befallen her Chinese friends and neighbors.

You have my best thanks for what you have done to help me. You have my even greater thanks for what you will do to help India.

Text of Moslems' Reply to British

The text of the Moslem League's reply to the British proposals follows:

While expressing gratification that the possibility of Pakistan is recognized by implication by providing for establismment of two or more independent unions in India, the committee regret that proposals of his majesty's government embodying fundamentals are not open to any modification and that therefore no alternative proposals are invited.

In view of the rigidity of the attitude of His Majesty's Government in regard to fundamentals not being open to modification the committee have no alternative but to say that the proposals in their present form are unacceptable.

The right of nonaccession to the union as contemplated in the draft declaration has been conceded presumably in response to the insistent demands by Moslems for the partition of India, but the methods of procedure laid down are such as to negative the professed object, for in the draft proposals the right of nonaccession has been given to existing provinces which have been formed from time to time for administrative convenience and on no logical basis.

Demand Clarification

Moslems cannot be satisfied with such a declaration on a vital question affecting their future destiny, and demand clear and precise pronouncement on the subject. Any attempt to solve in the future the problem of India by the process of evading real issues is to court disaster.

In the draft proposals no procedure has been laid down as to how the verdict of a province is to be obtained in favor of or against accession to one union, but in a letter from Sir Stafford Cripps to the Moslem League president it is stated that a province should reach a decision whether or not to stand out of the union by a vote in the legislative assembly on a resolution to stand in. If the majority for accession to the union is less than 60 per cent the minority will have the right to demand a plebiscite of the adult male population.

In this connection it must be emphasized that in the provinces where Moslems are in a majority, as in Bengal and Punjab, they are in a minority in the legislative assemblies; in the assemblies in Sind and Northwest Frontier provinces the total number, namely 60 and 50 respectively, is so small and the weightage given to non-Moslems so heavy that it can easily be manipulated and a decision under such conditions cannot be a true criterion for ascertaining the real opinion of Moslems in those provinces.

Plebiscite Opposed

As regards a suggested plebiscite in provinces in which Moslems are in a majority in event of the requisite majority not being available in the legislative assemblies, the procedure laid down is that reference shall be made to the whole adult population of the provinces and not to Moslems alone, which is to deny them the inherent right of self-determination.

In conclusion the committee point out that the position of the league has been and is that unless the principle of Pakistan, the scheme embodied in its Lahore resolution of March, 1940, is unequivocally accepted and the right of Moslems to self-determination conceded by means of machinery which will reflect the true verdict of Moslem India it is not possible for the Moslem League to accept any proposal or scheme regarding the future.

With regard to the interim arrangement there is no definite proposal except the bare statement that His Majesty's Government desire and invite effective an dimmediate participation of leaders of the principal sections of the Indian people in counsels of their country, commonwealth and the United Nations. The committee are therefore unable to express an opinion until the complete picture is available.

Another reason why the committee are unable to express an opinion on the interim arrangement for participation in counsels of the country is that Sir Stafford Cripps made it clear that the scheme goes through as a whole or is rejected as a whole and that it will not be possible to retain only the part relating to immediate arrangements at the center and discard the rest of the draft scheme, and as the committee has come to the conclusion that the proposals for the future are unacceptable it will serve no useful purpose to deal further with the question of immediate arrangements.

All-India Congress' Rejection of Proposal

The working committee have given full and earnest consideration to the proposals made by the British War Cabinet with regard to India and the elucidation of them by Sir Stafford Cripps.

These proposals which have been made at the very last hour because of the compulsion of events have to be considered not only in relation to India's demand for independence, but more especially in the present grave war crisis with a view to meeting effectively the perils and dangers that confront India and envelop the world.

The congress has repeatedly stated ever since commencement of the war in September, 1939, that the people of India would line themselves with the progressive forces of the world and assume full responsibility to face new problems and shoulder new burdens that had arisen, and it asked for the necessary conditions to enable them to do so to be created.

Freedom Held Essential

The essential condition was freedom of India, for only the realization of present freedom could light the flame which would illuminate millions of hearts and move them to action.

At the last meeting of the all-India congress committee after commencement of war in the Pacific it was stated that:

"Only a free and independent India can be in a position to undertake the defense of the country on a national basis and be able to help in furtherance of larger causes that are emerging from the war."

The British war cabinet's new proposals relate principally to the future upon cessation of hostilities.

The committee, while recognizing that self-determination for the people of India is accepted in principle in that uncertain future, regret that this is fettered and circumscribed and that certain provisions have been introduced which gravely imperil the development of a free and united national government and establishment of a democratic state.

People's Right Vitiated

Even the constitution-making body is so constituted that the people's right of self-determination is vitiated by introduction of nonrepresentative elements.

The people of India have as a whole clearly demanded full independence, and Congress has repeatedly declared that no other status except that of independence for the whole of India could be agreed to or could meet the essential requirements of the present situation.

The committee recognize that future independence may be implicit in the proposals but the accompanying provisions and restrictions are such that real freedom may well become an illusion.

The complete ignoring of 90 millions of people in the Indian states and their treatment as commodities at the disposal of their rulers is a negation both of democracy and self-determination.

While the representation of an Indian state in the constitution-making body is fixed on a population basis, the people of the state have no voice in choosing those representatives, nor are they to be consulted at any stage while decisions vitally affecting them are being taken.

Severe Blow to Unity

Such states may in many ways become barriers to the growth of Indian freedom. Enclaves where foreign authority still prevails and where the possibility of maintaining foreign armed forces, it has been stated, would be a likely contingency and a perpetual menace to the freedom of the people of the states as well as of the rest of India.

Acceptance beforehand of the novel principle of nonaccession for a province is also a severe blow to the conception of Indian unity and an apple of discord likely to generate growing trouble in the provinces and which may well lead to further difficulties in the way of the Indian states merging themselves into an Indian union.

Congress has been wedded to Indian freedom and unity and any break of that unity, especially in the modern world when peoples minds inevitably think in terms of ever larger federations, would be injurious to all concerned and exceedingly painful to contemplate.

Nevertheless the committee cannot think in terms of compelling the people of any territorial unit to remain in an Indian union against their declared and established will.

Strong National State

While recognizing this principle the committee feels every effort should be made to create conditions which would help the different units in developing a common and cooperative national life.

Acceptance of this principle inevitably involves that no changes should be made which would result in fresh problems being created and compulsion being exercized on other substantial groups within that area.

Each territorial unit should have fullest possible autonomy within union consistent with a strong national state.

The preposal now made on the part of the British war cabinet encourages and will lead to attempts at separation at the very inception of union, and thus create friction just when the utmost cooperation and goodwill are most needed.

This proposal has been made presumably to meet communal demand, but it will have other consequences also and lead to politically reactionary and obscurantist groups among the different communities and create trouble and divert public attention from vital issues before the country.

British Proposals Vague

Any proposal concerning the future of India must demand attention and scrutiny, but in today's grave crisis it is the present that counts and even proposals for the future in so far as they affect the present.

The committee necessarily attached greatest importance to this aspect of the question and on this ultimately depends what advice they should give to those who look to them for guidance.

For this the present British war cabinet's proposals are vague and altogether incomplete and there would appear to be no vital changes in the present structure contemplated.

It has been made clear that the defense of India will in any event remain under British control.

At any time defense is a vital subject. During war time it is all important and covers almost every sphere of life and administration.

To take away defense from the sphere of responsibility at this stage is to reduce that responsibility to a farce and nullity and make it perfectly clear that India is not going to be free in any way and her government is not going to function as a free and independent government during pendency of the war.

Trust in People Urged

The committee would repeat that an essential, fundamental prerequisite for the assumption of responsibility by the Indian people in the present is their realization as a fact that they are free and are in charge of maintaining and defending their freedom.

What is most wanted is an enthusiastic response of the people which cannot be evoked without the fullest trust in them and the devolution of responsibility on them in the matter of defense.

It is only thus that even in this grave eleventh hour it may be possible to galvanize the people of India to rise to the height of the occasion.

It is manifest that the present government of India, as well as its provincial agencies, are lacking in competence and are incapable of shouldering the burden of India's defense.

It is only the people of India through their popular representatives who may shoulder this burden worthily. But that can only be done by present freedom and full responsibility being cast upon them.

The comittee is therefore unable to accept the proposals put forward on behalf of the British war cabinet.

3-Day Truce At Ordnance Plant Voted

By the Associated Press

Charleston, W. Va., April 11.—A three-day truce, during which grievances are to be studied by a Federal conciliator, put the Navy's South Charleston Ordnance plant back in operation today after Gov. Matthew M. Neely made a personal appeal to union workers.

The men, after placing before Neely a list of grievances which they said had gone unsettled for months, voted unanimously to return to work at least until 4 p. m. Tuesday.

The midnight shift did not report last night at the 90-million-dollar factory operated under Navy lease by the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Corp., but the 4 p. m. shift went to work as agreed.

The Governor spoke three times at the meeting presided over by William Mackay, sub-regional director of the C. I. O. Steel Workers Organizing Committee and read a telegram from C. I. O. President Philip Murray asking that the workers return pending arbitration of their grievances.

Will Appeal to Knox

Appealing to the patriotism of the men jammed into a hall in suburban South Charleston, the Governor received a reply that the men believed themselves to be patriotic but they wanted attention paid to their complaints.

The Governor said he would be in Washington Monday and would appeal personally to Navy Secretary Frank Knox to insist that some machinery be set up in South Charleston for handling workers' complaints.

Smith Plan Calls for Profits Curb and 48-Hour Week

By the Associated Press

An eight-point war-labor policy, coupling a 48-hour work week with a limitation on profits, was proposed last night by Representative Howard Smith (Democrat), Virginia, with the assertion that labor disputes now "flourish and grow in a setting of uncertainty and confusion."

His program, outlined in an address prepared for a C. B. S. broadcast:

1. "No strikes until the workers themselves, after 30 days' notice, have by a majority of the employes, in a Government-supervised election, voted to strike.
2. "An absolute prohibition against all jurisdictional and sympathetic strikes.
3. "An absolute prohibition against boycotts of products in order to compel recognition of a union.
4. "An absolute prohibition against violence and intimidation in labor disputes
5. "A 48-hour week with time and a half for overtime.
6. "A cessation of all drives and demands for the closed shop, the union shop, and all shades thereof, with a guarantee to unions of the continuation of all present voluntary closed shop agreements.
7. "A re-affirmation of the right of free Americans to work without paying tribute, to be implemented by a limitation on initiation fees, dues and assessments.
8. "A limitation on profits."

Smith said that the patience of the American people had been taxed to the point where they were demanding legislation for a definite war-labor policy.

Substitutes May Supplant Tree Rubber

By Felix Cotten
International News Service Staff Writer

The United States may witness in the next few years the creation of a giant synthetic rubber industry which will replace natural rubber, whether obtained from the rubber tree or the guayule plant.

This was the consensus last night of a number of Congressional leaders and Government officials who have looked into prospects for producing satisfactory tires and other products from synthetic rubber at low cost.

The main question is the element of cost. The cost of tree rubber has been estimated at from 5 to 14 cents per pound. At first, it appeared that synthetic rubber never could be produced as cheaply as this. But there is considerable opinion now that it can be made even more cheaply.

Senator Truman (Democrat), of Missouri, chairman of the special Senate Defense Committee, declared the committee had information that butyl, the synthetic rubber developed by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, might be made for as low as 3 cents a pound.

Secret Process Studied

Another highly secret synthetic rubber, said to be about as cheap as butyl, is receiving official consideration.

Now that American inventive skill is directed toward producing a rubber substitute, marvelous results are believed possible in regard to both quality and cost.

This still does not mean, however, that the public may expect to get tires at any time in the near future. Even if it should be possible to produce practically unlimited quantities of good quality synthetic rubber at low cost, officials say several factors stand in the way of the public getting tires.

The first of these is the need for vast amounts of rubber for military purposes. The United States needs 700,000 tons or more of usable synthetic rubber a year to supply its own war needs and those of its allies.

Thus, even if the Far Eastern rubber supply had not been cut off, the public probably would be rationed on tires, with all non-essential demands eliminated entirely.

Lack Materials for Plants

Another reason why the public cannot expect tires is that, even under the most favorable circumstances, considerable time will be required to build synthetic rubber facilities and to get them in operation.

A third reason is that, while the war lasts, materials probably will be made available only for such synthetic ruber production facilities as are believed necessary for the war effort.

A movement, supported by Secretary of the Interior Ickes and some members of Congress, is under way to expand synthetic rubber facilities to a point where civilian needs would be supplied.

But other officials doubt that War Production Chief Donald M. Nelson, who is closing up durable consumer goods industries right and left to convert them to war production, would suddenly release a large amount of materials to build synthetic rubber plants to make tires for civilians.

The outlook, however, is better than a few weeks ago. There still is no certainty of relief. But plans now call for substantial quantities of synthetic rubber and the problem of producing satisfactory tires out of the material apparently has been solved.

Blackouts? Yes
Black Bread? No!

● Instead of the "Wheatless Mondays" and dark "war bread" of World War I—with substitute flours—this time there is plenty of wheat flour to go around.

America has an abundance of wheat . . . Canadian elevators are bulging . . . A new wheat crop is on the way . . . The problem is not rationing, but storage and the most effective use of food values in the wheat.

Hoarding anything is unpatriotic . . . Hoarding wheat flour is unnecessary. Black bread will not be a war problem here . . . American housewives will be able to buy peacetime high-quality Pillsbury's Best for the duration.

The milling industry's contribution to all-out war is enriched white flour . . . It is enriched with valuable B-vitamins and iron according to the recommendations of the National Research Council . . . It is regulation food for our nation's armed forces . . . It is being shipped to our allies overseas . . . It makes your kitchen a vital source of power for work in the arsenal of democracy . . . It is an essential food in our government's National Nutrition Program.

Enriched white flour can make up in food-energy for the rationing of sugar because foods baked from wheat flour are a complete substitute for sugar as a source of food-energy . . . Digestion converts wheat-starch into dextrose, a sugar which in the body produces heat and energy.

Enriched white bread—baked at home or by your baker—is the lowest-cost source of food energy today.

Enriched white flour makes real fightin' food . . . It is Pillsbury's best ammunition to help win the war . . . In addition to producing food in its mills, Pillsbury is producing in its machine shops certain necessary military equipment for the men behind the guns. Pillsbury Flour Mills Company is all-out to win the war.

The Federal Diary

By Jerry Kluttz

Machine Operations May Go on Two Shifts

Machine operations in the Federal service may be ordered on two shifts in all agencies because of the shortage of typewriters and other office equipment. The Government is hiring stenographers and typists at such an enormous rate that machines simply aren't available for them all. Nearly 40,000 stenographers and typists have been placed in jobs here since Pearl Harbor. That figure, however, isn't a net increase, as many were brought here to fill vacancies, yet 40,000 placements have been made, according to Civil Service records.

Typewriters have become so scarce that they are now being rationed to Federal agencies. Procurement Division is doing the rationing on authority from the War Proagencies—War, Navy, Maritime Commission and Lend-Lease—are exempt from the rationing program.

A committee of WPB, Budget Bureau and Procurement officials has been working on plans to get greater use from typewriters and other office machines now on hand. It is considering:

1. The placing of all Government machine operations on two and three shifts. This plan is heavily backed, as it would help solve the office space problem. Budget Bureau is reliably reported to be making a study of how Government offices could be operated efficiently on two and three shifts.

2. Taking typewriters from all secretaries and typists who use them only an hour or two a day. It's suggested that recalled typewriters be placed in large rooms where any employe could use them. Another recommendation is three typewriters for every five stenographers . . . Something drastic must be done. WPB has sharply curtailed typewriter production and Federal agencies are howling for tens of thousands of new typewriters.

1,260,000 Typewriters Built Last Year

Last year approximately 1,260,000 typewiters were built—730,000 standards and 530,000 portables. The Government purchased 220,000 of them. On March 18, WPB ordered typewriter production slashed. The order permits 325,000 standards and 75,000 portables to be made for the remainder of this year. Army and Navy will get 88 per cent of the portables and 68 per cent of the standards. Between March 15 and May 31, the Army will be permitted to buy 27,908 portables and 53,319 standards, the Navy 7855 portables and 21,373 standards. In June and in each succeeding month the Army will be allowed 3409 portables and 15,172 standards. The Navy, 959 portables and 6081 standards. But that isn't enough for the Army and the Navy and both services have indicated they will appeal to WPB for more machines.

Meantime, both Procurement and WPB are taking a census of the typewriters in the Federal service. It's a distinct possibility that typewriters in peace-time agencies will be shifted to war agencies. Procurement has rescinded its rule to the effect that typewriters can be traded in after three years. Now all machines must be used for the duration and Procurement has enlarged its typewriter repair shop here to overhaul the machines.

To get a new typewriter a Federal agency now must answer a detailed questionnaire which is expected to point to overstaffing in the Federal service. The agency must give the time each machine is used, the number of typists and stenographers, and a great many other questions.

WPB's division of civil supply drafted the typewriter order and is forcing a greater use of machines now on hand. The division is setting what it believes is a good example for the remaining Federal agencies. Each typewriter in the division has a card on which must be recorded all the work done and the time required. Machines that are seldom used are transferred to busier spots. Procurement has already placed its machine operations on two shifts and WPB has placed its duplicating section and several other machine operations on two and three shifts.

Post Writer Elected to Gridiron Club

The Gridiron Club, Washington's famous organization of newspapermen, yesterday elected Edward T. Folliard, of The Washington Post staff, to membership.

FOLLIARD

He is the ninth Washington Post writer to be elected a Gridiron member in a half century. Others were Henry Litchfield West, 1888; Frank Hatton, 1889; Berian Wilkins, 1892; Scott Bone, 1903; Clifford Berryman, 1906; Ira Bennett, 1909; George Rothwell Brown, 1928, and Franklyn Waltman, 1936.

Folliard was born in Washington May 14, 1899. He was educated in the local public and parochial schools, at what is now Columbus University and at George Washington University. He served in the United States Navy from June, 1917, to September, 1919, was shipwrecked in the Straits of Dover, but survived to write a weekly review of the Second World War for The Washington Post.

After serving his newspaper apprenticeship under the late John Edwin Nevin, Folliard joined the staff of the Washington Herald in 1922. He transferred to The Washington Post and, except for a period of two years, has been a member of its staff since 1923.

In his career as a reporter, Folliard has covered some of the biggest news stories of the time. He began covering national political conventions and campaigns in 1928. In 1936 he covered the electrocution of Richard Bruno Hauptmann at Trenton, N. J. In the same year he covered the Washington visit of Cardinal Paecelli, now Pope Pius XII.

Three years later he was traveling across Canada with King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. He had another brush with royalty last year when he accompanied the Duke and Duchess of Windsor from Miami to Washington.

In the fall of 1940 The Post sent Folliard on a 7000-mile air journey to inspect the United States new naval and air bases in the Caribbean. He was the first reporter to visit the French island of Martinique and see the 100 American-made planes that were just then beginning to waste away in the salt air.

On December 12th last, Folliard wrote a story about the gallant stand of the Marines on Wake Island, which was broadcast around the world in six languages. Editor and Publisher called it "one of the finest newspaper stories in many a long day."

Defense Workers' Leisure Activities Also to Be Studied

War Production Chief Donald M. Nelson, high Army and Navy officials and other key men in the war effort will present the Government's viewpoint on recreational needs of service men and production workers today to more than 1000 representatives of the country's U. S. O. campaign committees meeting at the Mayflower Hotel.

The conference, a prelude to the United Service Organizations 1942 war fund campaign to raise 32 million dollars between May 11 and July 4, will be opened at 10:15 a. m., with Federal Security Administrator Paul V. McNutt presiding, and continue until 5 p. m.

Speakers, in addition to McNutt and Nelson, will include Undersecretary of War Robert P. Patterson; Undersecretary of the Navy James V. Forrestal; Lieut. Gen. Brehon B. Somervell, chief of the Army Services of Supply, and Rear Admiral Monroe Kelly, assistant chief of naval operations.

U. S. O. officers also will address the conference, which Prescott S. Bush, U. S. O. national campaign chairman, described as "the first national conference given over to exhaustive discussion of the vital problem of supplying adequate recreational facilities for soldiers, sailors and defense workers since the war opened."

Meanwhile, Corcoran Thom, treasurer, and Sidney F. Taliaferro, chairman of Washington's 1941 U. S. O. campaign, announced that more than 170,000 persons contributed a total of $264,133.28 to the fund. The quota was $250,000.

They reported $153,221.46 went to the National U. S. O., $13,973.54 was deducted from Washington's share of the proceeds for campaign expenses and the following amounts were distributed to local organizations:

District Defense Council, $30,000; Catholic Charities of the District, $10,500; Committee on Volunteer Service, $7500; Phyllis Wheatley Y. W. C. A., $6300; Jewish Community Center, $6250; Soldiers, Sailors and Marines Club, $6200; Twelfth Street Y. M. C. A., $5750; Salvation Army, $5300; Y. W. C. A., $5200; Travelers Aid Society, $4800; Y. W. C. A., $4500; Federation of Churches, $3188.28; Rhoads Service Club, $950, and U. S. O. Council of Washington, $500.

Budget Officer Studies Measures To Increase Taxes

Licensing of pinball machines, juke boxes, cigarette machines, and raising the license fees for theaters, the ball park, skating rinks and other amusement centers has been suggested as a means of raising revenue in Washington.

In a report prepared by Budget Officer Walter L. Fowler, these recommendations have been made to the District Commissioners. They have referred the report to their license committee for further study.

Fowler said five States levy amusement taxes and that Ohio in 1938 collected $1,500,000 from this source of revenue alone.

At the present time, he said, Griffith Stadium pays an annual license fee of $5; theaters, $30; boxing arenas and skating rinks, $8. Fowler's report asks a $20 annual license fee for juke boxes; $15 for motion picture boxes, pinball and cigarette machines; $10 for other nickel machines and $2 for penny machines.

Besides this the report recommends "a moderate license fee for all business establishments not covered by the license law," so that authorities may have some supervision and control over all places of business were merchandise of any type is sold to the general public.

Capt. Marcey Seeks Lost Dog

Anyone knowing the whereabouts of "Carolina Jack' will earn the gratitude of Capt. Herbert L. Marcey of the White House Police by communicating with him.

The pointer, described by Capt. Marcey as "the best bird dog I ever saw in the field," disappeared a month ago from its owners residence at 2250 North Lexington, Arlington County, Va. The animal is eight years old, mostly white and has an odd spot on its tail.

Capt. Marcey said he has scoured the county in the last few weeks but without any success.

Doctors Await Assignment to War Service

The first step in placement of Washington physicians where they can be most useful in the war will be taken this week.

Dr. F. X. McGovern, chairman of the Procurement and Assignment Service for the District, announced yesterday that local medical practitioners will begin receiving questionnaires on Wednesday. These will be mailed simultaneously to every physician in the United States by the Procurement and Assignment Service, a unit of the Office of Defense Health and Welfare.

Doctors will be asked to indicate preference for type of practice—military, governmental (including civil service and Veterans Administration), public health, industrial, war industry area or civilian.

Dr. McGovern said Washington must not only supply its share of the 16,000-physician quota needed this year by the armed services but also see to it that the civilian population is provided with adequate medical care.

Members of the McGovern committee who will go over the questionnaires are Drs. James Alexander Lyon, James A. Gannon, Henry C. Macatee, A. Magruder MacDonald, Luther H. Reichelderfer, William Thornwall Davis and Henry R. Schreiber—all in private practice—and Lieut. Col. A. Clagett Gray, State medical officer for Selective Service in the District; Theodore Wiprud, secretary of the District of Columbia Medical Society, and Dr. William C. Goines, representing the District of Columbia Medico-Chirurgical Society.

According to Wiprud, 88 society members are now on duty in the Army, Navy and Marine Corps and several others have given notice that they are awaiting military assignment.

"As the number of physicians entering the military services increases," he said, "various procedures may have to be adopted to meet the medical needs of the community. Consideration has already been given this problem by the medical society's committee on military affairs, which is fully aware of some of the difficulties which will be encountered.

"The committee is confident, however, that a solution will be found, as local physicians have given splendid support to all defense projects and have demonstrated their desire to do everything possible to assure the successful prosecution of the war."

Man, 82, Among 2 Beaten, Robbed By Footpads

Two men who were beaten and robbed by footpads early yesterday were recovering at Casualty Hospital last night as police sought their assailants in local pool rooms and beer gardens.

Cavour O. Bohrer, 82, of 1232 Trinidad Avenue Northeast, was beset by two Negroes who apparently believed he carried a large sum of lodge dues with him. He was returning from a meeting of the Eastern Star when he was attacked near his home. A small amount of change was taken from him.

A neighbor took him to Casualty Hospital, where he was treated for severe bruises on his face and body.

Second victim of after-midnight prowlers was Alex D. Edwards, 28-year-old insurance collector, of 1101 West Virginia Avenue Northeast, who was slugged unconscious and robbed of $66 at Fourth and G Streets Northwest.

He was found unconscious on the street by a cab driver. Herbert Lepper, of 212 G Street Northwest, who took him to the hospital. Doctors said the injured man may have a fractured skull.

U. S. Production To Be Forum Topic

Theodore Granik's American Forum of the Air will discuss "What is the Democratic Way to Increase Production" when it is broadcast over the Mutual Broadcasting System at 8 o'clock tonight from the West Ball Room of the Shoreham Hotel.

Speakers will be Eli L. Oliver, chief of the labor relations section, labor division, War Production Board; O. C. Cool, director of the Labor Relations Institute; Charles Pack, president of the Doehler Die Casting Co., and Joseph W. Frazer, president of Willys-Overland Motors, Inc.

Revised D. C. Budget Draft To Get Study

A revised estimate of District budget requirements for the next fiscal year, reported totaling close to $56,500,000, will come up for its first Congressional examination tomorrow.

The House subcommittee on District appropriations will begin hearings on the 1943 supply bill at 1:30 p. m., and the first witnesses will be the District Commissioners, according to Representative Mahon (Democrat), of Texas, subcommittee chairman.

The only exact District budget estimate available yesterday was the $34,548,562 figure submitted to Congress in January with the national budget estimates.

The revised estimates, reportedly boosting the original figure by about two million dollars, were awaiting final approval by Budget Director Harold Smith, and the President's signature, before being forwarded to Congress.

Million for Highways

A Budget Bureau official pointed out, however, that the District subcommittee will receive the figures in time for tomorrow's hearings.

Reported increases over the original estimates sought by District officials include one million dollars for highways, and $980,000 for general District expenses. The revisions also were reported to include a decrease of $16,000 for water services.

Main purpose of the one million dollar highway increase would be to start construction of the proposed South Capitol Street Bridge across the Anacostia River. It was explained that when the budget estimates were first drawn up, uncertainty about revenue kept the South Capitol Street Bridge fund out of the highway program.

This uncertainty, it was said, was straightened out by the recent 1-cent increase in District gas taxes, and the transfer of other highway projects to the current fiscal year. This transfer left the 1943 highway program "light," and made room for the South Capitol Stret project.

New Tax Plans

Meanwhile Chairman Hunter, of the District fiscal affairs subcommittee, said he had not yet set a date to start study of proposals for a District sales tax, and the alternative plan of increasing levies on real estate property in Washington.

The real estate tax increase was criticized yesterday in a statement by Rufus Lusk, representing the Washington Taxpayers Association, to Commissioner Young.

Lusk hit the plan as unfair to owners of different pieces of similar property, and as a sure-fire rent-raiser for practically all kinds of property in Washington. He called on the Commissioners to oppose the real estate tax increase proposal.

Chairman Randolph of the House District Committee reported that he will set a date tomorrow for a committee meeting to seek action on a bill to remove the present 5 per cent tax on net profits of out-of-town corporations trading in Washington, and on a measure to authorize the Commissioners to set up facilities for scientific testing of motorists suspected of drunken driving.

In addition, Randolph said House District leaders will be asked in the next few days to decide on the next step for the bill to coordinate District recreational facilities. The bill has passed both House and Senate, but in different forms, so that alternatives are for the House to accept Senate amendments and send the measure to the President, or seek in conference to adjust the differences. The bill provides for a seven-member board to supervise public recreation.

Recuperating Wagner Visits White House

Senator Robert F. Wagner (Democrat), New York, who has been recuperating from a long illness, visited President Roosevelt in the White House yesterday for the first time in months. He was accompanied on what he said was a purely social call by James A. Foley, surrogate of New York County, and Mrs. Foley.

Asked about labor legislation pending in Congress, the author of the National Labor Relations Act said he would "let the other fellows talk about that." Asked for his "views on inflation," he replied: "I'm against it."

D. C. Blackout Setup Set for Test Tuesday

The District Commissioners yesterday issued special regulations affecting Washington and its environs for the first "total" blackout here which will darken the metropolitan area on Tuesday night for half an hour sometime between 9 o'clock and midnight.

During the blackout, the regulations state, every light must be either out or screened so as to be invisible from the outside, except:

1. Navigation lights, both air and water, including airport, pier and wharf lights.
2. Lights incidental to the operation of military equipment.
3. Lights in or on Federal Government buildings where specifically authorized by the deputy air raid warden for Federal buildings.
4. Lights customary for the normal operation of railroad and bus transportation, including terminal facilities.
5. All lights customary for the normal operation of any public utility and of any industrial plant engaged in essential war activity, and;
6. Driving lights on certain vehicles permitted by regulations to operate during the blackout.

All other cars must stop and remain motionless when the blackout signal—a 2-minute fluctuating wail of the city's 38 electric sirens—is given. Traffic will be stopped in a 15-mile area surrounding Washington.

Col. Lemuel Bolles, civilian defense director, declared drivers should pull over to the curb during the blackout leaving the key in the ignition and the car doors unlocked. Then the driver and all passengers should take cover.

Reason for this, he said, is so that in a real raid the car could be moved if it is obstructing entrances or is endangered by falling debris.

The colonel also said that those who do not expect to be home during the blackout period should be certain all lights are off.

Colonel Bolles and Chief Air Raid Warden Clement Murphy will give last minute instructions to all deputy wardens today at 4 p. m. in the air raid warden headquarters, 1341 Maryland Avenue Northeast. Tomorrow at 7:30 p. m. a demonstration of incendiary bombs will be given at Central High School.

"Clean Up for Victory Week," when a concerted effort will be made to empty every Washington household, store, office and building of salvagable materials, was set yesterday for April 26 to May 2.

The Junior Board of Commerce, in cooperation with the D. C. Salvage Committee and the District unit of the Bureau of Industrial Conservation of the War Production Board, will direct the drive.

William H. Sardo, jr., in charge of administration of the effort, heads a staff of 72 Junior Board members who will supervise collection by defense areas. Erwin H. Klaus will direct a promotion campaign to bring the salvage program home to Washington residents through cooperation of newspapers, radio stations, motion picture houses and citizens, church and trade organizations.

A luncheon meeting of the Junior Board next Thursday at the Annapolis Hotel will hear Lessing J. Rosenwald, chief of the WPB Bureau of Industrial Conservation, and James E. Colliflower, chairman, and Horace Walker, secretary of the D. C. Salvage Committee.

Housekeepers who are about to indulge in the annual housecleaning orgy will receive pointers on what to salvage for war production at a mass meeting called by the women's division of the D. C. Salvage Committee for April 21 at the United States Chamber of Commerce, Seventeenth and H Streets Northwest.

Speakers will include Charles P. Taft, of the Federal Security Agency; Jonathan Daniels, assistant to OCD Director James Landis; James Colliflower, chairman of the D. C. Salvage Committee, and Mrs. P. C. Ellett, president of the District Congress of Parents and Teachers.

Meanwhile, Commissioner John Russell Young yesterday accepted the official District Salvage Committee poster on behalf of the city, a job representing the donated services of at least seven local concerns.

The Graphic Arts Association appealed to its artists to submit entries in a recent contest sponsored by The Washington Post. The poster drawn by Samuel H. Traeger, 1325 G Street Northwest, won the transitad class.

A total of $150 in defense bonds as prizes had been donated by local scrap dealers. In order to get the posters before the public the following concerns gave their services free:

Stanford Paper Co., Lanman Engraving Co., Capital Printing Ink Co, and the Law Reporter Printing Co. Approximately 1600 copies of the poster will be placed in Capital Transit streetcars and buses by Tuesday.

Glover Park Area Will Open Post

The air-raid warden post for Sector 3, Zone 2 of the Glover Park area, located in the basement at 4020 Beecher Street Northwest, will be open for public inspection every Monday and Friday from 8 to 9:30 p. m. Wardens will be on hand to explain to visitors the set-up and to help them in planning any precautions at home. The post has recently been completely equipped with the latest devices.

Union's Ambulance Accepted by City

Commissioner John Russell Young accepted a brand-new ambulance for the District Government yesterday which had been presented as a gift by members of the Carpenters Union, Local 132, of the A. F. of L.

Members of the union contributed for the purchase of the vehicle and collections were handled by a union committee including G. B. Wathen, president of the local; W. A. Johnson, business agent, and Edgar J. Appel, secretary.

14 More Firms Put On Bond Honor Roll

Fourteen new additions to the Payroll Savings Honor Roll, bringing the total to 177, were announced last night by the District War Savings Committee.

They are: Castelberg's, Joseph DeYoungs, Inc., Fannie May Candy Company, Globe Distributing Corporation, House & Hermann, Hub Furniture Company, E. Kahn & Company, Inc., Kent's, Julius Lansburgh Furniture Company, Majestic Distilling Company, Inc., Marvin & Snead Sales Corporation, National Furniture Company, Roma Wine & Liquor Company and the Try Me Bottling Company.

Service Men Join War Bond Program

Members of the armed forces will join Merle Thorpe, editor of Nation's Business; John C. O'Laughlin, publisher of the Army and Navy Journal, and William Mather Lewis, president of Lafayette College, in a radio program to be broadcast tomorrow night in behalf of the local sale of war stamps and bonds.

The program, "A Call to Arms," will be heard over WMAL and WRC from 8 to 8:30 p. m., and will feature the music of the Fifth Engineers Regiment orchestra from Fort Belvoir, a song by an American sailor, and a story by a second sailor regarding the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Trash Fire Causes Navy Building Alarm

A trash basket afire in an office in the ninth wing on the fourth floor of the Navy Department last night sent fire apparatus rushing to the Constitution Avenue structure. The blaze was extinguished without damage.

Varied Program At Central Meeting

A civilian defense meeting will be held tomorrow night at 7:30 p. m. in Central High School with local OCD officials and others giving talks. Motion pictures and demonstrations will be included in the program.

The speakers will include Chief Air Raid Warden Clement Murphy, Assistant Director of Civilian Defense Capt. William L. Clemens, and Hugh Morris, commercial representative of the C. & P. Telephone Co.

Motion pictures entitled, "Fighting the Fire Bomb," "Defense and the Telephone," and "Safeguarding Military Information," will be shown. Following this a demonstration of magnesium bombs and smoke screens will be held in the athletic field adjoining the school.

Long-Trip Travel By Cars Cut 40 Per Cent

Long-trip travel by passenger automobiles in the United States already has dropped by almost 40 per cent, due to Nation-wide tire rationing and gasoline restrictions in the East and Pacific Northwest, the American Automobile Association reported yesterday.

The A. A. A. estimated that gasoline consumption by private passenger cars now is 20 per cent below April, 1941.

Another indication that motorists were keeping closer to home came from the National Park Service, which reported that visits to parks in the first three months of the year dropped by 30 per cent.

Some private resorts depending on motor-borne patronage, the service said, estimated their business is off 50 per cent, compared with a year ago.

OGR Expects to Occupy Mellett's Madhouse May 4

Army and Navy Eyes Reported on Part Of New Structure

The Office of Government Reports will move into its new block-square information booth at Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue Northwest on or about May 4, it was learned last night.

Just to make the confusion attending the construction of the Madhouse complete, there were reports last night that the Army and Navy would take over a section of the new structure to enlist recruits, possibly from the harassed businessmen who go there to find out just who it is they want to see in Washington. The reports were not confirmed.

Signs of Activity

As the building neared completion, passersby yesterday noticed that a very neat but extremely modest "U. S. Information" sign of wooden letters had been placed atop one of the entrances on the south or E Street side of the building. Many were heard to wonder out loud whether the OGR was carrying out the speakeasy motif in having its callers enter the building from what heretofore has been regarded as the rear of the structure.

Definite confirmation of the moving date could not be obtained, but Addison G. Foster, assistant director of OGR, substantiated reports reaching The Post from other sources when he said May 4 had been mentioned in discussions as the probable moving date. Foster, however, said he did not know whether this date had been definitely selected.

Many Out of Town

Miss Harriet M. Root, director of the OGR's information service, said she did not know exactly when the staff would move into "Mellett's Madhouse," but added that she understood "sometime around the first of May" would be the moving date.

Other officials of the OGR either said they did not know when the office would move or were unreachable. Director Lowell Mellett was said at his Alexandria home to be in Hollywood, Calif.; Philip C. Hamblet, OGR's executive officer, was attending a regional conference of some sort in Atlanta, Ga., and Administrative Officer D. Stanley Mitchell said he had just returned to Washington from his annual 26-days' leave and had not even been to the office.

Foster said no decision had been reached, to his knowledge, as to whether to move the OGR's division of press intelligence along with the rest of the office staff. Charlotte J. Hattan, director of the "clipping bureau," could not be reached for comment.

Miss Root said she understood her information service would move to the "Madhouse" along with the other OGR sections.

Unidentified Man Killed By Trolley Is 37th D. C. Victim

D. C. traffic deaths this year.... 37
Deaths this date last year..... 24
District total last year 95

Police last night sought to identify the District's thirty-seventh traffic victim who died at Emergency Hospital early yesterday after being struck by a streetcar in the 1300 block Seventh Street Northwest.

He was tentatively identified from cards in his pockets as Frank Clarke, 30, but this identification was set aside when no one knew him at addresses found in his clothing.

He first was said to be James Hyman, of 1230 Twelfth Street Northwest. Hyman, however, was found to be alive and could not say who the dead man was. Last night efforts were being made to check the man's fingerprints with police and Army and Navy records.

A streetcar operated by Benjamin F. Hawkins, 42, of 4513 Arkansas Avenue Northwest, struck the man when he stepped from an automobile which was parked abreast.

Meantime, an inquest was scheduled for tomorrow in the traffic death of Policeman Irving Rosenberg, 53, of 1104 Allison Street Northwest, who was fatally injured February 11, when a scout car he was driving crashed into a bus at Thirteenth anad M Streets Northwest.

The coroner's hearing has been held up until this time, it was said, awaiting the recovery of Policeman Eugene Danielwicz, who was riding with Rosenberg and was seriously injured. He recently was released from Emergency Hospital.

Leroy A. Kelly, 24, of 1406 Webster Street Northwest, driver of the bus, will appear at the inquest.

Senators Seek Justice Dept. Patent Data

By the Associated Press

The Senate Patents Committee disclosed yesterday that it had subpenaed records of the Justice Department and a score of leading industrial firms preliminary to a study of the effect of patent controls on war production.

A committee announcement added that "other subpenas now in preparation will carry the inquiry into additional industries where sabotage through patents is apparent."

The evidence, the committee said, will be used in connection with public hearings beginning tomorrow on legislation authorizing the compulsory licensing of all patents needed in the war effort.

Chairman Bone (Democrat), of Washington, said the committee had subpensed files of the antitrust division of the Justice Department related to the following war materials:

Magnesium, hormones, film, paraffin, methane steam process products, dyestuffs, iron carbonyl, ammunition, zinc, cellophane, soap, plastics, tungsten carbide, colombium and other steel alloys, military optical goods, acetylene, acetic acid, electrical equipment and related products in the electronic field, rayon, aviation gasoline pumps, Diesel engines, aircraft instruments and accessories, beryllium, synthetic quinine, tin, alcohol and synthetic rubber.

The announcement also said that some seventeen Federal agencies would present exhibits and testimony concerning the effect of patents on production.

It was added that records had been subpenaed from the following companies:

Remington Arms Co., Bridgeport, Conn.; American Smelting & Refining Co., New York City; New Jersey Zinc Co., New York City; E. I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., Wilmington, Del.; Union Carbide & Carbon Corporation and its subsidiaries, New York City; Nincet Chemicals Corporation, New York City; Standard Oil Co. 8 G.M. Officials Must Pay Back Over 6 Million

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11 (AP).—Judge Vincent L. Leibell in United States District Court today found that eight present or former executives of the General Motors Corporation had improperly managed the corporation's bonus funds, wasted corporate assets and made an unauthorized distribution of stock value at $1,567,883.

He directed the officials, including Alfred P. Sloan, jr., chairman of the board of directors, Junius S. Morgan, George Whitney and Donaldson Brown, to reimburse the concern to the amount of $4,348,044, plus interest charges estimated at another two million dollars.

The decision was made in a suit brought by three minority stockholders, Mrs. Augusta Winkelman, Daniel Hirshman and Charles Schiff, all of this city.

Judge Leibell ruled specifically that the bonuses paid to the executives could not be considered excessive because of the competition in the automobile industry for first-class administrators, but he criticized various methods used to calculate the bonuses. He said that in the case of the formation of the General Motors Management Corporation, the medium for distributing bonuses, the stockholders were not fully informed of all details.

Those involved besides Morgan, Sloan, Brown and Whitney were James D. Mooney, Seward Prosser, John Thomas Smith and Albert Bradley.

The court exonerated Clarence M. Wooley and John J. Schumann, jr., also officials of General Motors, of any part in the transactions. They had been served in the suit originally.

People Fully Alert, Says Gov. Griswold

Wichita, Kans., April 11 (AP).—Gov. Dwight Griswold (Republican), of Nebraska, declaring that complacency over the war seems centered in Washington instead of the people, tonight said "Government officials are inclined to mistake the confusion at the Capitol for a confusion in the minds of the people."

"The only part of our Nation which is still conducting 'business as usual' is Government itself," he said, "and I have heard of no bureau in Washington which has discharged any employes because it feels they are no longer necessary."

Louis R. Leonard To Be Buried Today In Massachusetts

Burial services for Louis R. Leonard, architect in the quartermaster office of the War Department, who died last Sunday at his home, 3034 Cambridge Place Northwest, will be held here Wednesday at Gawler's Funeral Home.

Mr. Leonard, who first came to Washington in 1935, was a native of Boston and studied at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and at L' Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris. At one time he was professor of architecture at the Carnegie Technical Schools in Pittsburgh.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Emma B. Leonard, and two daughters, Mrs. Cornell Blanding, of Syracyse, N. Y., and Mrs. Anders Hagstrom, of Stockholm, Sweden.

File-Rifling Trial to Open Tomorrow

Four men and one woman are scheduled to go on trial at District Court tomorrow, charged with illegally taking about 21,000 personnel information sheets from the files of the Civil Service Commission.

Arrested in January of 1941, the defendants have had their trial delayed several times because of crowded criminal dockets at the courthouse.

They are accused of taking the records—reported to contain highly confidential information—from Civil Service offices in the old Barber and Ross Building at Eleventh and G Streets Northwest.

The documents were then used, authorities assert, to compile mailing lists which were sold to various concerns from the offices of Standard Business Service, direct mail advertising firm.

The indictment which will bring the five to trial before Justice James W. Morris contains 14 counts, according to Prosecutor Charles B. Murray. Seven of these charge illegal removal of the records while the other seven accuse the group of stealing them.

Moffett's Former Wife Weds Arnold

New York, April 11 (AP).—Wedding of Mrs. Adelaide Kim Moran, former wife of James A. Moffett, one-time Federal Housing Commissioner, to William Arnold, vice chairman of the Democratic National Finance Committee, was disclosed today.

The ceremony was performed in Greenwich, Conn., yesterday by Judge Joseph J. O'Brien. Future plans of the couple were not announced.

Mrs. Arnold's first husband, Joseph F. Moran, a shipbuilder, died in 1929, leaving her approximately one million dollars. She subsequently married Max Bamberger, a broker. They were divorced. Her third marriage, to Moffett in 1934, ended in a divorce in 1937.

Vinson Drafts Milder Labor, Profits Policy

By the Associated Press

Chairman Vinson (Democrat), of Georgia, of the House Naval Committee, yesterday drafted modified legislation to curb war profits and provide for a 48-hour work week without overtime pay.

Back here after sounding out public sentiment in his Georgia district, he announced he would present the new measure as a substitute for the more stringent Smith-Vinson bill which he and Rep. Smith (Democrat), of Virginia, introduced earlier. The new measure calls for:

1. A normal 48-hour work week, instead of the present 40 hours, with time and a half pay for work beyond 48 hours.

2. An 8 per cent profit limit on all war work on contracts over $100,000 plus a $6000 "cushion profit allowance" to provide, Vinson said, "an incentive to encourage the conversion of small industry to war production."

3. Freezing of the union status in industry; plants now rating as closed shops retaining that status for duration of the war, while unions would be prevented from converting open shops to closed.

4. A $5 maximum initiation fee to any union engaged in war production.

5. A system of "incentive bonuses" for workers.

Explains Profit Limit

The Smith-Vinson bill calls for a 6 per cent profit limitation, and suspension of the 40-hour week and the closed shop in all plants handling defense contracts.

As Vinson explained it, the cushion profit allowance would operate in this manner:

On a $100,000 contract, the contractor could receive 8 per cent, or $8000, plus the $6000 cushion or a total of $14,000. On a million-dollar contract, the profit would amount to $86,000, or 8.6 per cent. Vinson said that as the size of the contract grew, the comparative importance of the "cushion" diminished.

Meanwhile Senator Reed (Republican), of Kansas, wrote Chairman Truman (Democrat), of Missouri, of the Senate Defense Investigating Committee urging an immediate inquiry into charges that a recent flood of mail to Congress members demanding labor legislation was inspired by "organized propaganda."

President Philip Murray of the C. I. O., recently charged that an organized campaign was being waged for changes in labor laws and asked a Congressional investigation.

Believes It Spontaneous

Reed, author of bills to outlaw the closed shop in war industries and to suspend the 40-hour week, made clear that he thought an inquiry would show most expressions on the subject were spontaneous.

He said he had received 5000 communications and added:

"Of the 5000 letters and telegrams about 4000 favor a restatement of our national labor policy. About 1000 oppose any legislation on this subject.

"The people are mad and they are getting madder. I am glad of it. If they will get mad enough and stay mad long enough, we will get something done here in Washington."

Recalling a charge by Chairman Thomas (Democrat), of Utah, of the Senate Labor Committee, that much of the mail had been inspired by a letter written by the United States Chamber of Commerce suggesting an expression of opinion to Congress on labor legislation, Reed said only about 10 of the letters he had received could be traced to that source.

Systematic Union Drive

On the other hand, Reed said it was apparent from his mail that certain union organizations were carrying on a systematic campaign against changes in the labor laws.

"Of perhaps 1000 communications taking this side of the question," he said, "about 25 could be considered as an individual and spontaneous expression of the writer. Identical words, phrases, description of pending bills by numbers and by names of the authors of the bill leave no doubt as to the remainder."

K. of C. Names Heazel To Succeed Callahan

New York, April 11 (INS).—The Knights of Columbus late today announced the election of Francis J. Heazel, of Asheville, N. C., as supreme treasurer of the organization.

Heazel, an attorney, succeeds Daniel J. Callahan, jr., of Washington, D. C., who held an interim appointment to that post following the death last February of his father, who held the office 33 years.

American Girl Isn't So Short Nor So Dumpy

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—The American woman's figure is not so short and it's not dumpy, says the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. On the contrary "the average stature of American women is showing satisfactory improvement."

The Metropolitan's studious statisticians admitted that they had been investigating the length and breadth of the female figure ever since the United States Department of Agriculture reported that the average height of American women was but 5 feet 3 1/6 inches.

"This relatively low figure creates a false impression in that the measurements were made in stocking feet, whereas the commonly quoted average is based on measurements in shoes," said the statisticians.

They thought that 5 feet 5 inches would be a fairer way to list the average for the little woman—assuming she wears shoes with a 2-inch heel.

"Furthermore, better times are ahead," they predicted.

"While in general today's women may not have figures as attractive as the movie stars and professional models, who are popularly held up as ideals of the sex, improvement of the average stature may be expected to continue until the general average of future generations should come close to that of the glamorized groups," their report stated.

They thought that the Government report was "biased," inasmuch as "the (Government) sample contained a disproportionate number of such groups of women as those from the cities, the Eastern seaboard and low-income families—in which the average is distinctly low as compared with the general population."

The statisticians agreed with the Government, however, that American girls were taller than their mothers—girls 18 to 25 averaging an inch taller than women between 45 and 55.

3 Benefit Parties Raise $51.80 For Blood Bank

A contribution of $18.40 was announced by Mrs. Chester J. Bradley, child welfare chairman of the Victory Auxiliary Unit, American Legion.

Two Legion benefit parties are scheduled for Thursday night. The women's auxiliary of Vincent B. Costello Post will play cards for the Children's Hospital fund at the home of Mrs. Sadie Dearing, 2431 Newton Street Northeast. Potomac Post and its auxiliary unit will hold its benefit at the Legion Club.

The American Legion, Washington Bridge League and The Washington Post are co-sponsors of the fourth annual blood bank campaign.

Army-Navy Relief Show Will Enlist Topflight Stars

Stars whose total incomes exceed two million dollars a year will perform for Army-Navy Relief April 30 at the Capitol Theater when the Hollywood Victory Caravan opens a tour of 14 cities, it was announced yesterday.

Produced by Mark Sandrich, Hollywood director, the three-hour show will enlist the talents of some 100 topflight movie, radio and stage entertainers, musicians and technicians, according to advance notices. Sponsors hope to gross $26,000 for the one-night stand here on paid admissions alone.

Screen Actor James Cagney and Comedian Bert Lahr have been announced as two of the production's stars.

Priced from $1.50 to $20, tickets will go on sale at the Capitol Theater this week, at a date to be announced, on a first-come-first-served basis.

COI Suspends Gilmor, Former Editor of Friday

Dan Gilmor, son of Rear Admiral Horatio Gilmor, U. S. N., (retired), and former editor of Friday, a magazine which was anti-Administration and antiwar until German troops invaded Russia, has been suspended from his job in the office of the coordinator of information pending investigation, it was disclosed yesterday.

James B. Opsata, personnel director of the CIO, admitted Gilmor had been suspended last Monday, and added that the Civil Service Commission had been asked to investigate the case.

"The office of the coordinator of information is no place for anyone about whom there is the slightest doubt," Opsata said. "At the same time, we intend to be fair to our employes. We do not intend to accept every idle rumor as a reason for action against anyone."

It was learned from reliable sources that the initiative in the case was taken by the War Department, which a week ago asked that Gilmor be removed from his post as a picture-planning expert.

Cupid got in stride with the war effort yesterday to sponsor a wedding keyed to the tempo of the times.

And Dell Fulton, 21, took just 17 minutes off from work on a Navy Department construction project at Seventeenth Street and Constitution Avenue Northwest to marry Miss Esther Smart, 23, a Federal Bureau of Investigation clerk.

At 11 a. m. Fulton dashed four blocks to his car, drove to a restaurant, changed to his suit, drove to Juvenile Court, got married and returned to the job. It was 11:17 when he checked back in.

Last night the Fultons gave a small reception at the bride's home, 1018 Eighteenth Street Northeast, where they'll live on returning tonight from a "wedding trip" to some nearby spot. She has to report for work at 11:30 p. m.

J. Adam Bede Dies in Duluth At Age of 86

J. Adam Bede, 86-year-old humorist and former Republican Congressman from the Eighth District of Minnesota, died of a heart attack in Duluth, Minn., late yesterday while walking with a friend.

In national politics for more than half a century, Mr. Bede served in the House of Representatives for three terms. He was first elected in 1902, and was returned to the Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Congresses. He later served two years in the Minnesota State Legislature.

Mr. Bede was born on a farm in Lorain County, Ohio, the son of a Welsh immigrant. After a public school education, he became a printer, public school teacher, newspaperman and lawyer. He was for a time a Washington correspondent.

Breaking with the Republican Party to support Grover Cleveland for the Presidency, Mr. Bede returned to the G. O. P. fold in 1896 because of his disagreement with Bryan's free silver platform.

His reputation as a humorist, first recognized in his home state, was enhanced by his speeches from the floor of the House and won him a place as a platform lecturer and after-dinner speaker.

A member of the Harbors and Rivers Committee while in Congress and a staunch advocate of internal improvements, he had recently been active in support of the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway.

Bataan Falls After Epic Struggle; Japanese Carry War to Indian Ocean

By Edward T. Folliard

Post Staff Writer

Bataan, Bay of Bengal, Burma —these were names that spelled bad news last week.

The magnificent stand of the American-Filipino Army on Bataan was broken. Smashing through Gen. Jonathan M. Wainwright's left flank, the vastly stronger Japanese troops swarmed over the peninsula and threw a sack around some 36,853 heroes who had held them at bay for three months and six days.

From a numerical standpoint it was "the most severe reverse ever suffered by an American force in a single engagement with a foreign foe."

But Bataan also was one of the most glorious pages in America's military history, a symbol of courage and fighting skill against impossible odds, and a portent of the fury that is to strike Japan one day when the tide of battle turns.

It was so recognized by the newspapers of London, among others.

"They have written a chapter of stubborn heroism which will never be forgotten," said The Daily Mail.

"The long-drawn-out resistance will rank with the defense of Malta, Tobruk and Sevastopol among the outstanding episodes of the war," said The News-Chronicle.

Bataan raised the name of Gen. Douglas MacArthur among the great commanders of the war. It drove his first Japanese antagonist, Lieut. Gen. Masaharu Homma, to suicide. Four men won the Congressional Medal of Honor in the campaign, and a host of others won the Distinguished Service Cross or the Distinguished Flying Cross.

Costs Great

What the conquest cost Japan is not known in any detail, but her losses in manpower and material must have been great. A battleship, the Haruna, was sunk, and another battleship was set on fire. Even as Bataan was being overrun, American torpedo boats sank a Jap cruiser off Cebu, thus raising the cruiser toll in the Philippine campaign to two. Nine transports also were sunk.

As the week drew to a close, Gen. Wainwright sent a brave message to President Roosevelt from his GHQ on Corregidor Island in Manila Bay.

"Our Flag on this beleaguered island still flies," Wainwright said.

Corregidor, its garrison strengthened by 3500 sailors and marines who escaped from Bataan, was not expected to hold out long. It could be pounded not only from the air, but by Japanese artillery mounted on the Marivales Heights in Bataan. If Wainwright refused to surrender, Gen. Tomoyuki Yamashita was expected to send assault troops across the waters of Manila Bay to storm the island fortress.

Army men here thought there was slight chance of Gen. Wainwright breaking through the Japanese lines. Since Gen. MacArthur got out, they said, the Japanese blockade has been considerably tightened by warships brought from the Java theater.

When MacArthur arrived in Australia after his dramatic journey from Bataan, he said:

"I came through and I shall return."

That was a pledge that involved the honor of the United States. It will be kept.

Another 'Pearl Harbor'

A week ago today, at 8 o'clock in the morning, 75 Japanese planes loosed from aircraft carriers in the Bay of Bengal roared down on Colombo, capital of Ceylon. Obviously it was intended as another Pearl Harbor—a surprise attack on Easter Sunday morning that would make a shambles of Colombo's docks, ships and air fields.

What it turned out to be was the most disastrous air defeat Japan has suffered in the war to date. From the day that Singapore fell, thus removing the barrier that kept the Japanese out of the Bay of Bengal and the Indian Ocean, Gen. Archibald Wavell had been strengthening Britain's crown colony of Ceylon.

And so when the 75 Japanese planes came roaring at Colombo, R. A. F. fighters swarmed into the air to meet them. They tore into the Rising Sun marauders with a fury reminiscent of the Battle of Britain, knocked down 27 of them and damaged 30 others, many of which must certainly have crashed into the sea on their way back to the aircraft carriers.

This heartening victory was hailed as further proof that the Japanese flyers are no match for American and British airmen when surprise and superiority of numbers is denied them.

Bay of Bengal

A day or so later, London newspapers were hinting that a "great naval battle" was brewing in the Bay of Bengal. Good tidings were expected, news perhaps that the sinking of the Prince of Wales and the Repulse had been avenged.

The news came quickly and it was shockingly bad. Japanese bombers from aircraft carriers had sunk two splendid British cruisers—the 10,000-ton Cornwall and the 9,975-ton Dorsetshire. For a time, it looked as if the Cornwall and the Dorsetshire, like the Prince of Wales and the Repulse, had gone into battle without the protection of aircraft.

Later on, however, it developed that the Japanese had sunk not only the two cruisers but a British aircraft carrier as well. This was the 23-year-old Hermes, first vessel especially designed by the Admiralty as an aircraft carrier. She carried only 20 planes, as compared with 60 or 70 carried by the eight or so aircraft carriers still left to Britain.

The Japanese apparently sent several aircraft carriers into the battle, and that seemed to be the reason for their triumph. Once again they had scored with their air arm, piling up a toll of Allied men-o'war that began with their raid on Pearl Harbor.

The victory appeared to give the Japanese clear naval superiority in the Indian Ocean. Unless Maj. Gen. Lewis H. Brereton's American Flying Fortresses, based on the Indian mainland, could retaliate, there was danger that the Japanese might extend their naval blockade so as to interfere seriously with Allied war supplies traveling by sea to Russia, India, Burma and China.

The situation brought concrete proof of the disaster involved in the fall of Singapore, which guarded the passage to the Indian Ocean.

India in Doubt

Adding to the gloom that hovered over that part of the world was the news from New Delhi, scene of the fateful conference on Sir Stafford Cripps' plan for Indian post-war independence. Yesterday the negotiations appeared to have broken down amid Hindu charges that Sir Stafford had been hamstrung by the London war cabinet.

Just what effect all this would have on the military situation in India was not clear.

Gen. Wavell was reported to be marshaling "every available man-o'-war, airplane and soldier" for the defense of the Ganges Basin of India.

The Indian Army now numbers 1,500,000 men, and is said to be growing at the rate of 40 to 50 thousand recruits a month. A good part of this army is, of course, in Egypt, Libya, Iran and Iraq. Nevertheless, what remains in India must be far larger than the forces Japan has been using in the South Pacific.

It is for that reason, among several others, that military men have doubted that the Japanese would actually attempt an invasion of India in this stage of the war. Right now, however, the political situation being what is, they are loath to make any predictions about that particular theater.

In Burma the Japanese continued their advance toward the oil fields and Mandalay last week, racing against the monsoon that usually arrives in mid-May and turns lower Burma into a quagmire. Their overall objective was to add Burma and its 15 million to their Greater East Asia empire, to cut off supply routes to China, and to prevent the United Nations from using Burma as a springboard for an attack.

There was a difference of opinion about whether Burma could be used as an invasion route to India. A. H. Seymour, head of the Burma Purchasing Mission here, told The Washington Post that "the territory through the west of Burma into India is practically impenetrable."

Marshall in London

Gen. George C. Marshall, United States Army Chief of Staff, and Harry L. Hopkins, controller of American war supplies, flew to London during the week, and precipitated a great flurry of speculation.

Obviously the purpose of their visit was connected with the Battle of Russia. Grave though other aspects of the war may be, the No. 1 plank in the Allied war program is give aid to Russia—material aid if that is all that is needed, direct military aid in the form of new fronts if that be necessary.

President Roosevelt has defined the Allied strategy as follows: To prevent an Axis break-through, to punish the enemy as much as possible, and in the meantime to build up to a superiority that will make possible a final drive to victory.

For Russia to go down would be a break-through that would bring awesome consequences. But that is looking at it from a negative standpoint. If Russia can hold her own, if she can tie up the German army for another winter, then Hitler can prepare to make good on his threat to blow out his brains.

Russia Tightens Hold

The news from Russia last week was pretty much the same as the week before and also the week before that. The Red army was still tightening its grip on German strongholds; however, the Germans were continuing to hold on. Hundreds of German planes were reported to have been knocked down. Some of these, it was said, were fresh out of the factory, and so, too, were some of the tanks that were sent into action—indicating to the Russians that Hitler was not only being forced to throw his "spring reserves" of men into battle, but his reseves of material as well. London suggested, however, that the Germans probably were testing this new equipment.

Vice Commissar S. A. Lozovsky, the Russian spokesman, appeared to be serene at a press conference at Kuibyshev. He said:

"The objective facts indicate that we, on our front, will liquidate the Germans in 1942."

Was that wishful thinking? Some suggested that it was. Just for the sake of the record, however, it should be recalled that it was this same Lozovsky who last July, during the ferocious fighting around Smolensk, said flatly that the German blitzkrieg was a "washout." And so it was.

By holding the Germans in the Smolensk area, the Russians won time to strengthen the defenses of Moscow, to marshal reserves and to throw the Germans back at the gates of the capital on December 6, the day before Pearl Harbor.

What of 1942?

The question of what is to happen in Russia in 1942 is the most fantalizing question facing the world today. Max Werner, a military writer with a good record as a prophet, comes forward with the answer boldly in the current issue of Redbook. The answer is, he says, that Hitler is doomed to failure in Russia.

The Redbook article is well worth reading. Here are a few excerpts from it:

"The great German offensive is inevitable. Its failure to come off would mean an admission of weakness and inevitable defeat for the Germans. Before his army and his country, Hitler has assumed the obligation to undertake this offensive. This German offensive will be waged at any price, with the greatest consolidation of available forces, and with supreme brutality."

Werner says that the soldiers of Hitler's allies—the Italians, Hungarians, Rumanians, Slovaks and Bulgars—will be of little value, since they lack training in modern weapons, lack enthusiasm, and have little stomach for the dreadful fighting that lies ahead.

"It is quite certain," he says, "that the Red army will be numerically superior to the Wehrmacht . . . The strength of the Red army must now be put at some ten million men . . . All in all, the Red army will probably have more than 400 divisions at its disposal, giving it a numerical superiority of about 20 per cent over the Wehrmacht."

After discussing production of war weapons in Germany and Russia, Werner says:

"In the coming super-battle the Wehrmacht will have more offensive weapons than the Red army, but not too many more . . ."

"The issue of this battle, however, will not be decided solely by masses of reserves and arms. There is the question of the fighting capacity of the two armies . . . Since the battle for Moscow, combat capacity of the Red army has been rising while that of the Wehrmacht has been declining.

"It is of special importance for the impending issue this summer that the Red Army has found ways of compensating the German superiority in offensive arms, particularly tanks. Specially trained infantry, anti-tank artillery, special anti-tank planes and tank obstacles of various kinds served to halt and then to beat back the panzer divisions.

"The Russian artillery has greater variety than the German, and it is stronger and more effective. The Russian infantry is at least the equal of the German in the field, and it has greater endurance. The time is past when

By John G. Norris

Post Staff Writer

The spotlight of world attention focussed on Gen. George C. Marshall last week as the Army chief of staff suddenly arrived in London for secret conferences with British military chiefs.

His dramatic arrival made headlines in American newspapers from coast to coast. And the man in the street—reading constantly of MacArthur, Wainwright and the other generals on the fighting fronts—suddenly remembered that Marshall was still top man of the United States Army.

The tall, fast-talking Army leader has been out of the limelight since war came to America four months ago. Swamped with the manifold tasks of getting the war effort started, Marshall has been almost entirely out of the news.

Never a publicity seeker, he has left even the expected news-making appearances of his office—congressional hearings, occasional speeches and press conferences—to others.

Marshall's visit to London, however, was big news—headlines even in a week that saw the fall of Bataan, the sinking of a record number of Japanese ships by American forces, and the vital British-Indian negotiations. For the American Army head was in Britain to plan an Allied offensive against the Axis.

His visit on such an important mission served to call attention to his administration of the Army during the past 33 crucial months. Marshall became chief of staff of the Army in the summer of 1939—just before the war broke out in Europe—and thus is largely responsible for its condition today.

For the last few years, Gen. Marshall has been in the unenviable position of having to prepare for war in every possible theater of the world.

Hitler's generals never had this problem. They were told where to fight. They prepared for the Polish campaign, then for the Lowlands and France, Greece and Russia. But the United States Army has had to prepare to defend its shores, to fight in the Caribbean, in South America, Africa, Asia, Europe, if need be, and wait until war came to know which it would be.

Before the attack on Pearl Harbor, any suggestion that the War Department was making plans to carry on war overseas brought congressional demands for court-martial of the "culprits." And yet every Army officer from Gen. Marshall down knew there was every chance that they would be called upon in a hurry to send an A. E. F. across the water.

Still, Marshall had to build an army, prior to December 7, in a country divided over the question of foreign policy. This caused morale troubles in the ranks, and made it doubtful for many months whether the selectees and Guardsmen would be held in service or allowed to go home after a year's service—a factor that handicapped planning.

Adding to his difficulties was the fact that the troops had insufficient and largely obsolete equipment. Inadequate arms production and the necessity of sending much of what was produced to the Allies fighting overseas were responsible for this.

Taking all these factors into consideration, Gen. Marshall has done a good job of building an Army.

It cannot be said that Gen. Marshall had foreseen the blitzkreig. Who had, outside of the German high command?

But once its nature was revealed during the fall of 1939 and the winter of 1940, he acted swiftly.

Before the fall of Poland, he asked for and obtained funds for concentrating the available army in the South and inaugurating continuous field maneuvers.

Whatever the nature of the new tactics, it was essential that America's soldiers be thoroughly drilled in the fundamentals before they could be expected to take on such advanced military technique. Maneuvers were costly, as funds for the Army were judged those days, and previously two weeks a year was all that was devoted to large scale fighting drill.

During the "phoney war" period of early 1940, Marshall inaugurated studies looking toward creation of an armored force. It was not actually created until just after the fall of France but the necessary plans had been underway earlier.

In whipping new divisions together in the expanding army, Marshall recalled his experience in 1917 and insisted on complete planning and preparations.

He was named operations officer of the First Division in June, 1917, when that outfit was hurriedly thrown together and sent to France. He found himself without tables of organization or other essentials for his job, and had to plow his way out of confusion.

As a result, new divisions are built now in accordance with as perfect a blueprint as the Army's best brains can devise.

Some critics of the Army have felt that the War Department was late in installing some of the new blitz weapons. The plane-tank team and the tank destroyer did not appear in maneuvers until last summer, two years after the war began in Europe. An air-borne command, using gliders, was not set up until last week.

It must be remembered, however, that such things represent the postgraduate work of military training. Marshall can't just press a button and tell a subordinate to have a plane-tank team ready tomorrow. Troops must be thoroughly drilled in the fundamentals before practice in the refinements of warefare is of any value.

The chief of staff gave a similar answer to critics who charged a year ago that he was building an old-style mass army. They pointed to the fact that the Army had only three or four armored and one motorized division.

"What good is it to create armored divisions on paper," Marshall said. "We're establishing new units as fast as we get the tanks. In the meantime, we're building infantry divisions and training men in the fundamentals of fighting.

"It will be comparatively easy to convert one of these into an armored or motorized division once it is trained. You've got to develop soldiers before you make them into tankmen."

CHIEF OF STAFF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL

And what of the man himself? What is the history and character of the soldier who heads the American Army in its most crucial hour?

George Catlett Marshall was born in Uniontown, Pa., 61 years ago, the son of a well-to-do coal operator. He decided on a military career as a boy, and when he couldn't get an appointment to West Point, enrolled at the Virginia Military Institute.

There he quickly won the enduring admiration of the whole student body. Seriously wounded with a bayonet while being hazed, he refused to tell the authorities how it happened or who did it. During his four years at V. M. I., he distinguished himself in football and as a cadet commander, and finished fairly well up in his class.

Winning a commission in the Regular Army, in 1902, young Marshall was sent immediately to the Philippines. As a lieutenant of Infantry, he soon demonstrated his extraordinary ability as an Army staff officer.

Some maneuvers were scheduled and Marshall's chief was supposed to prepare the rather complex battle orders. The superior was suddenly taken ill, and the general in charge asked Marshall if he thought he could do the job.

Lieut. Marshall said he thought he could and started to dictate to them in the presence of the general and his staff. The result was a model battle plan which amazed the veteran officers.

While still a lieutenant, he went through the Army schools at Leavenworth with honors and was named an instructor there. By then, he was a known "comer" in the service.

A captain when America entered the first World War, he rose to a colonelcy before the Armistice. Just prior to the Meuse-Argonne offensive, he performed what was described as the "most difficult staff operation of the war."

As operations officer of the First American Army, Marshall moved 820,000 men in two weeks to set the stage for the Argonne push. The huge and complex task was perfectly carried out.

So brilliant was the young staff officer that Gen. Pershing picked him for his aide-de-camp after the war.

His most notable post-war service until he became chief of staff probably was as assistant commandant of the Infantry School at Fort Benning, Ga., fountain-head of military thought of the Army's largest branch. His reforms and influence were felt there for years afterwards.

Prior to taking the Army's top job, Marshall successively commanded an infantry regiment, served as an instructor with the National Guard, headed an infantry brigade, and was chief of Army war plans and deputy chief of staff.

Primarily a great military planner and staff strategist, rather the inspirational leader of the MacArthur type, Marshall is entirely lacking in dramatics. His friendly, yet dignified and earnest manner make a tremendous impression. He early won the complete confidence of Congress and the press by his frankness and sincerity, and has held it.

Simplicity marks his personal life. His chief pleasures are riding horseback and a quiet picnic occasionally with his wife. This simplicity was evidenced recently.

A Washington newspaperman was returning from a trip to Norfolk several weeks ago. Pullman reservations were sold out and he took a day coach. Looking for a seat, he came upon Gen. Marshall, in uniform, quietly reading in the noisy car, filled with sailors and soldiers and the run of mine of humanity.

When the train reached Washington, he says, Marshall gathered up his three bags and got off. The newsman watched to see what sort of guard there would be waiting. There was none, however.

A few soldiers stood idly by, not paying any attention, but the general made no effort to press them into service, as the reporter half expected he would. Finally Marshall managed to collar a redcap, who put him in an ordinary cab.

Imagine any of Hitler's or Mussolini's top generals traveling like that

Foundation Wages War On Disease

By Gerald G. Gross

War restricts the scope of its activities, holds down the number of its beneficiaries and raises innumerable obstacles to its quest of knowledge, but it cannot stop the Rockefeller Foundation. A little blue book that has just appeared, presenting a condensed review of the foundation's work in 1941, provides heartening reassurance that nothing short of overwhelming catastrophe can stay its scientists in the execution of their missions for humanity.

Even as our armed forces are fighting the Japanese to the death on land, on sea and in the air, the Rockefeller Foundation's medical researchers are perfecting a yellow fever vaccine that one day may save the lives of millions of Nipponese. Slowly but surely, these test tube wizards are gaining on typhus and in a better day Germans and Italians, as well as Australians, Scandinavians and Americans, will reap the benefits.

Role of Science

"If we are to have a durable peace after the war, if out of the wreckage of the present a new kind of cooperative life is to be built on a global scale, the part that science and advancing knowledge will play must not be overlooked. For, although wars and economic rivalries may for longer or shorter periods isolate nations and split them up into separate units, the process is never complete because the intellectual life of the world, as far as science and learning are concerned, is definitely internationalized, and whether we wish it or not an indelible pattern of unity has been woven into the society of mankind.

"There is not an area of activity in which this cannot be illustrated. An American soldier wounded on a battlefield in the Far East owes his life to the Japanese scientist, Kitasato, who isolated the bacillus of tetanus. A Russian soldier saved by a blood transfusion is indebted to Landsteiner, an Austrian. A German soldier is shielded from typhoid fever with the help of a Russian, Metchnikoff. A Dutch marine in the East Indies is protected from malaria because of the experiments of an Italian, Grassi, while a British aviator in North Africa escapes death from surgical infection because a Frenchman, Pasteur, and a German, Koch, elaborated a new technique."

During 1941 the foundation made appropriations totaling $9,313,964, of which approximately one-half was spent in the fields of public health and medical science. No longer is a representative maintained on the European continent, the last office—in Lisbon—having been closed last July. The London office is still in operation. Late in 1940 the foundation's Far Eastern branch was transferred from Shanghai to Manila. When the Philippines capital fell to the Japanese, the assistant head of the Far Eastern office, Dr. Charles N. Leach, was captured.

Foundation's Grants

Dr. Fosdick's report shows that the foundation is producing millions of doses of yellow fever vaccine for the Army, Navy and Public Health Service—free. It is making a malaria study on the island of Trinidad, seeking a specific treatment for typhus and intensifying its quest of a vaccine that will control influenza.

But health and medicine are not its sole concerns. Glance at a few of the foundation's grants last year:

University of Chicago, for research in molecular spectra, $25,500.

China Medical Board, for paleontological research in Asia, $30,000.

Council on Foreign Relations, for study groups and research in problems of the war and of the peace settlement following the war, $103,700.

University of Oxford, for the work of its Social Studies Research Committee, $24,300.

Government of Finland, for the use of the University of Helsinki in the maintenance of its teaching and research program, $50,000.

Museum of Modern Art, for a study of role which films, particularly those from totalitarian countries, play in wartime communication, $5,000.

University of Michigan, for a program of teaching English to advanced students of Spanish-American background, $15,000.

Johns Hopkins University, for nutrition research, $18,500.

And so on, scores of grants like these, all dedicated to Dr. Fosdick's belief that "the Bill of Rights will outlast 'Mein Kampf' just as the scientist's objective search for truth will outlive all the regimented thinking of totalitarianism."

On a map of the Lincoln Park section, Capital Civilian Defense workers plot "damage" incurred during an "air raid" on the city as reports are received at the control station. Meanwhile, other workers direct the disposition of fire control, demolition and rescue squads. This station is in the Kingham School at Fourteenth and E Streets Northeast. James M. Landis, national director of Civilian Defense, who witnessed the demonstration, is shown at the right as he inspected the equipment of a rescue truck with R. E. Minder. The truck, manned by 14 men, carries equipment for use in the removal of injured people from wrecked buildings.

Defense Activities Bring Out Neighborhood Spirit in Capital

By Christine Sadler

Before civilian defense came along, there were experts who would argue there were no Washingtonians. The District of Columbia, they maintained, was filled up with a lot of people homesick for other places. As for neighborhood pride, they said there was none of it.

Well, they should go visit some air raid warden posts and then sit down and eat their words. What the country store is to Vermont, the warden post has become to Washington. Where there were no neighborhoods, it has created them.

In hundreds of blacked-out recreation rooms and apartment house basements all over town, neighbors are busy day and night packing first-aid kits, reporting on housing surveys, making maps, running mimeographs, building storage cabinets, devising stretchers and discussing what went on in the last bomb class.

General orders may come from the top, but each warden operates with considerable individuality and has his own ideas on what is going to be most beneficial in an air raid. No two posts look alike.

A Model Sector

Take the post of Sector 8, Zone B, of the Sixteenth Street Highlands Civilian Defense Area as the first illustration. The warden, William T. Kirk, has become generally known as the "Mayor of Rittenhouse Street."

A messenger with an armband lets you into the place through an ingenious system of double doors, under which no light gleams. It's in the basement, which is outfitted with enough equipment for a hardware store and decorated with a screen made of defense posters.

On the wall is one of the most complete sector maps in town. Not only is every house of the sector shown on the map, but all the names of householders and their telephone numbers. One segment of the map is Vinegar Hill, a colored neighborhood.

"That's an interesting human interest story," Warden Kirk tells his visitors. "Joe Carter is in complete charge there. When we started our collection of $1 from everybody, I told Joe just to ask, but not insist. Those families do not have much money, but the response was almost 100 per cent."

Kirk had 30,000 tons of sand emptied into his sector, sent word for every householder to come for six buckets. Only one family sent word it didn't see the use.

Good File System

He has a break on some of the other wardens when it comes to communicating with his families. "We have access to the world's best duplicating system," he laughs. "I don't suppose it has to be any secret, but it is the Supreme Court's. One of my assistants works up there." He keeps a file of the communications in a filing cabinet along with survey data and cards on all sector inhabitants.

"Little store-bought" first-aid kits get only contempt from Warden Kirk. He keeps one around just to show how inefficient they are, but his real kits are large and commodious, and stocks plentifully, as he thinks they should be. As a matter of fact, they are old Army kits.

In among his axes, shovels, crowbars, lanterns and sand barrels, Kirk has a 7-ton hydraulic jack which he considers would be very useful in bolstering up a fallen house.

Sector 6 in the same zone and area is wardened by W. Lee Santman, who has worked so hard at his job he has lost 18 pounds since November, although playing golf never made him lose any.

Warden Santman has given over his recreation room and most of his basement to the post, has a rug on the floor, serves doughnuts and coffee to visitors and makes his wife pay the post's telephone and light bills "as her share of the war." Like nearly all the wives in Zone B, Mrs. Santman has to come to headquarters if she wants to see her husband.

"My wife got so tired of my working every night, she has gone away for a rest," declares E. E. McGowan, who is the "boss warden" in Zone B and believes his area has the best equipment in Washington.

Well Equipped

McGowan "shanghaied" Santman and made him take the sector warden's post. They were World War buddies. Santman and Assistant Warden W. Stanley Taylor proudly exhibited the equipment, which included a stirrup pump, a 50-gallon drum of water, and a cooler of drinking water—as well as blankets, pillows, a stretcher, lanterns, axes, shovels, two radios, etc. Santman secured several stirrup pumps for his area before priorities went on them, but is having difficulty getting his first aid supplies because deliveries are uncertain.

Still in the same zone is Sector Post 7, wardened by E. J. Petty, who can build almost anything and runs his post with money made from salvaged paper which he and his committee collect each week.

Petty has made about 20 benches, which can be used by civilian defense "students" who come for classes and also which can be hooked two together to make cots. He has mats and blankets for them, can sleep ten people. Also, he and E. J. Conrad, assistant warden, have made a stretcher that looks good enough for patenting—and he has improvised first-aid splints from trimmed-up tree branches.

Use Basements

The two other sector wardens in McGowan's zone are H. R. Behrmann, whose speciality is first aid equipment, and Ernest Dematatis. Both have the post set up in basements of the apartment houses in which they live.

E. C. Madgeburger is deputy warden for all of Sixteenth Street Highlands, but there wasn't time to visit everywhere. He and McGowan started out together in November, had a terrific time getting everybody interested.

"We hoofed all over the area every night. The job was a heartbreaker at first, and then it has been hard work all the way. The wardens had to go to school every night for months and they still don't get any time to rest, but their enthusiasm never gives out now. It fluctuates a little now and then with some of the citizens, but the wardens pep it back up.

"As a matter of fact, I think we all like the work and have learned a lot about each other from it. I guess it has been harder on our wives than us, after all," he says.

One of McGowan's major problems right now is wondering how he can get all over his zone Tuesday night during the blackout. He's supposed to visit each sector—and will, somehow, but he can't run his automobile and the distances are pretty stiff out in his area. He meant to buy a bicycle for just as uch an emergency, but they slapped priorities on them before he found time to do it. (Leon Henderson ought to make an exception for Zone Warden McGowan, we think.)

Robert A. Hull, jr., who is in the price analysis division of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, is the deputy warden in the Southwest Civilian Defense Area—which considers itself one of the District's most vulnerable spots, jutting into the Potomac as it does and being so near the Navy Yard.

Wife Lends a Hand

During the daytime Mrs. Hull answers the headquarters telephone and carries on when the staff is absent. She came to Washington less than a year ago from Connecticut to work for the British Purchasing Commission, thought that was the most interesting job she'd ever had—before civilian defense. She was married to Warden Hull in October. He became deputy warden two weeks later and life has held no dull minutes since that moment.

"I'm going to write a book about this some day," she says. "I have learned nearly everybody in the Southwest and there are 32,000 of them, about half of them white and half colored.

"Our furniture here at headquarters came mostly from the undertaker and Neighborhood House. Money for the warden services comes from salvage.

The headquarters room looks somewhat like a church, because the benches are dinette seats with high backs, loaned by the Kober Court—where the Hulls live.

In Sixteenth Street Highlands there has been no turnover of personnel, but in Southwest the chiefs of services are always changing. Signed up for warden service in the area are 1185 persons.

The big problem there has been getting supplies. First aid classes, as well as most of the other courses, have been attended by white and colored alike, and everybody gets along well together. Admittedly the best rescue squad of the area is headed by a colored man. The Rev. Thomas Garnett, blind and colored, comes to headquarters each morning, answers the telephone and types out messages.

"We have found that both races can cooperate if given the chance," Mrs. Hull says.

Just now there is a slackening of interest in office work necessary around the posts, but the Hulls think that will pick up. As in several other parts of the city, married women who seemingly could do this daytime work find it boring and can't get interested. The telephone starts ringing busily around 3 p. m. and doesn't let up until well after the dinner hour.

In addition to being the fill-in daytime deputy, Mrs. Hull is on the civilian defense committee, which is headed by Harry S. Wender, and is secretary of the Southwest Citizens Association.

Production Lines

By Alfred Friendly

This department, in its best Pollyanna mood today, advances the thesis that the war is going down in history as the twentieth century's greatest boon to American aesthetics.

This derives from the fact that the inexorable demands for raw materials, particularly scrap metals, is going to cleanse our countryside of the mid-Victorian monstrosities which clutter up lawns and parlors, courthouses and courthouse squares, public parks and private collections.

Far-fetched and facetious as this may sound it will be true and within 18 months.

The present scrap collection and salvage program is expected to meet the appetite of the country's blast furnaces in 1942. But next year, according to War Production Board experts who have been studying the situation, much more intensive scraping of the barrel will be necessary.

This does not mean that patriotic matriarchs must hurl their wedding rings and family heirlooms into the melting pot, but it does mean that the old Civil War cannon, the statues of the town hero, the iron fences and the grills and the metal doors are bound for the smelters.

Such a program is manifestly impossible as long as there is other scrap iron available in the form of junked autos in "graveyards," abandoned bridges and rail lines, worn out farm machinery and industrial scrap. But this is being collected in a salvage campaign that has been gathering momentum in the last two weeks.

WPA trucks and workers, Agriculture Department and WPB investigators and other specially employed experts have now canvassed every auto graveyard in the country and are demanding that they be cleaned out in a matter of a few weeks. At the same time every farm is being visited with a collection truck, and in thousands of communities WPA workers are wrecking old bridges and tearing up old streetcar and railroad lines. Industrial committees are doing the same job inside factory fences. The countryside is being scoured clean—and the steel mills will be fed their scrap from these sources for another nine months or so.

But old iron sows no seed. Once the present junk heaps have been cleaned up they will not build themselves up again; autos, farm and industrial machinery will no longer be junked as fast as in the era of glorious abundance. More stringent steps must be taken, for there is no getting around the fact that to make steel, some scrap is necessary in mixture with the pig iron.

Thus 1943 is going to see a search for old metal that will be unparalleled; a search that Government experts seriously predict will go into homes and buildings and force the ripping out of metal frames and trim. Iron grilles, iron fences, bronze statues, lamp standards, poles, braces, cables, railing, ornamental metal of almost every sort will be destined for the stew pan.

As an indication of the seriousness with which the experts view the scrap iron situation, many are earnestly studying the possibility that transatlantic vessels, returning from Europe, will bring back to American steel furnaces a new kind of scrap—battlefield scrap, comprised of the tanks and trucks and guns and shell cases blasted in the theaters of war.

This same ravenous appetite for war metals, now or scrap, is also playing hob with traditional concepts of value. For generations—eons indeed—there have been base metals and rare metals. There still are, but the classifications have been completely switched.

For proof one need only look at WPB limitation orders. They forbid the use of lead, zinc, copper, tin and finally, steel and iron in hundreds of common household and consumer articles. But if you choose to fabricate them of gold and silver, there is no one to say you nay. Metal for burial vaults and morticians' goods? Sorry, no lead—it's too valuable. But the green light is on for a solid gold casket.

The man with a mouth full of gold fillings can walk down a dark alley with no worries. But he'd better be careful if he's wearing a horseshoe nail ring.

If this trend of reversals of old values continues, there's no telling where it will end. We envision a day when newspapers will be printed on parchment because of the shortage of woodpulp; when leather scarcity forces slippers of glass and crystal; when women's coats will all be of mink; kitchen tables will be of marble and teak, and toothbrushes of ivory and bird-of-paradise quills.

GALLERY GLIMPSES

If Congress turns back-flips and cartwheels, spins into a power dive, and generally starts throwing the stuff in the next few weeks, you can lay it to one thing—the primaries.

Every member has his own plan for winning the war. If legislation would do it, each has a patent on the only way. But right now members are getting a load of just how to win it from somebody who really knows and is always right.

What constituents thought, wouldn't matter very much except for that one thing. The Congressional primaries start this week.

Suddenly every voter is a generalissimo, giving orders. Congress? Well, until elections are over, they're just the troops. Every member who could go, went home during the recess for instructions.

Last week they started drifting back. There was a gleam in those eyes that meant votes. In the House, the curtain will go up on the primary capers this week. The Senate, which recessed later and will holiday longer, will return a week from Monday.

"Believe me, you're going to see some action," said Senator Pepper. He stole a march on what the grass roots were saying on a pre-holiday cross-country speaking tour.

Representative Andy May, of Kentucky, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, was first of the House members to return. May sampled the vibrations of the bluegrass country.

"They want to get on with this war," he said. "They're 100 per cent for prosecuting it all the way, and eliminating non-essentials. They're not blaming anybody in particular, but they want to get going. And they'd vote to suspend everything that doesn't count."

What the grass waves are saying is what Congress will be saying. What Congress doesn't say with legislation, the primaries will be saying with votes.

It wasn't many years ago that Old Doc Townsend was run out of the Ways and Means Committee.

That was before someone thought up the idea of taking over his plan for defense.

The Doc wanted to finance the old folks by a tax on transactions drawn to raise five billion dollars. Everyone called it a crackpot tax. The committee made things so hot that Doc Townsend walked out.

But last week the committee listened with wrapt attention to a plan for raising seven billion dollars for the war program with the same kind of a tax.

Meyer D. Rothschild, retired New York business man, called it a turnover tax. At a 1 per cent rate, he said it would raise 7 billion dollars in war revenue without increasing prices more than 3½ per cent.

Now seven billion happens to be the precise amount the President asked Congress to raise. The Treasury recommended a lot of less pleasant ways to raise it, including tripling of last March 15 income levies for most middle bracket taxpayers.

Was Mr. Rothschild given the bum's rush? He was not. The turnover tax actually stands a fair chance of coming out of the committee in some form.

The old folks would be left where they are, under social security. The mythical $200-a-month to keep them in cigarette money would be turned into guns, just to make certain there would continue to be social, or any other kind of security.

* * * *

Despite Administration opposition, a clear majority of the committee last week were in favor of a sales tax or some similar form of consumption levy.

Trouble is, there are as many forms of sales taxes as there are members of the committee, and no two members are agreed on the precise form they want. The turnover plan added one more to a list that runs all the way from retail and manufacturers' excises to the British purchase tax.

On April 16, the committee will complete the last of its hearings and go into an executive huddle for a month or more. Along about the middle of June you ought to know how much you must borrow to pay next year's taxes.

That's just four months before elections. What the voters are saying about taxes isn't printable here, but they know there's got to be a tax bill, are ready to take it and wonder what's holding it up. Pretty soon they will find out.

Committeemen know what the voters are thinking about this year's income taxes. They can imagine what they will think of next year's. What they can't imagine is having to vote to treble them. That explains all of the talk about a sales tax, the only other way out.

Jockeying for position will start late this week. A lot depends on which tax first comes to a vote.

Under normal procedure, the Treasury recommendations would be voted on first, and that would bring up the income tax, first crack out of the box.

If it comes up first, chances are it would be adopted. Sales-tax advocates will insist that the whole tax field be reviewed before any vote is taken. This would give the committee an opportunity to take a second look at the sales tax before it voted big taxes on incomes.

Now it can be told how a Senate subcommittee unearthed that suppressed report of a long-forgotten commission which forecast nearly 20 years ago that the Japs had aggressive designs on the United States.

John B. Trevor, captain of Military Intelligence on the first world fracas, dropped the whispered hint at a recent committee hearing. Trevor didn't know where the report was or all of the details. He did know that Gen. Charles P. Summerall, retired, in charge of the Hawaiian Army post at the time, supplied most of the facts. It was Summerall's section of the report that was suppressed in 1923.

He verified two things. There was such a report. So far as the general knew it was in the archives of the State Department. Maybank, aided by Senator Tom Stewart, of Tennessee, dug it out.

Of course no politics was intended, say the Senators, but the report is certain to figure in the coming Congressional elections campaign.

It was suppressed by a Republican Administration. That makes it the obvious Democratic answer just in case Republicans charge this Administration appeased Japan before Pearl Harbor. And they will.

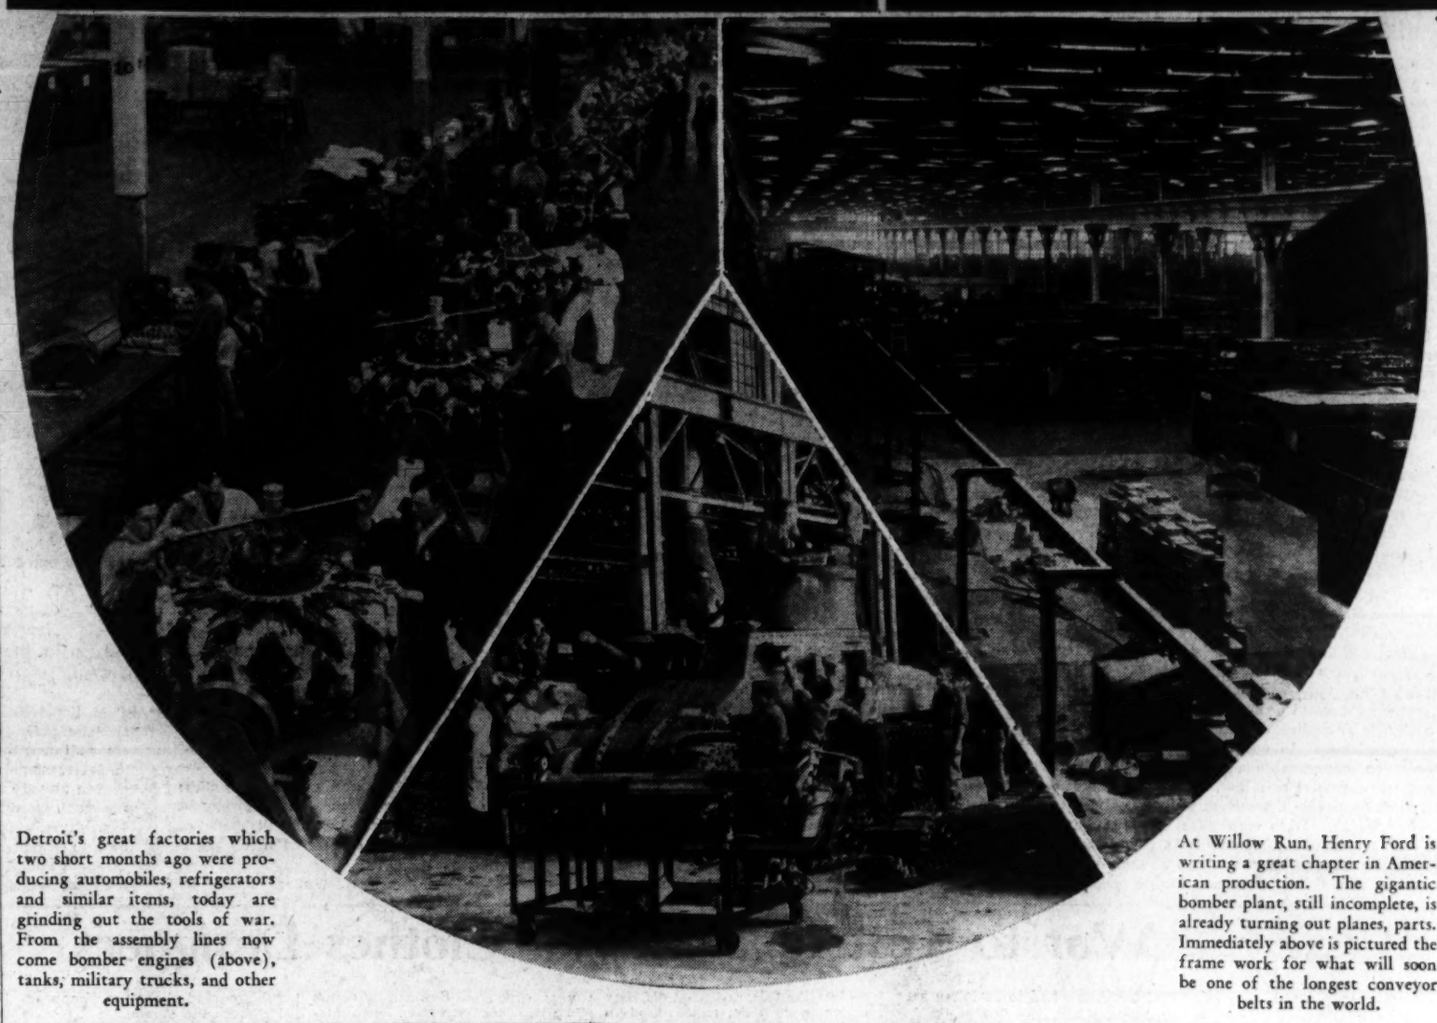
Rapid Conversion of Detroit Auto Plants Is an Amazing, Heartening Story

By Barnet Nover
Post Staff Writer

Detroit Area, April 8.—Until February 1, Detroit was the world's greatest producer of automobiles. That fact every child knows. What may not be generally known is the amazing story of how Detroit is rapidly being transformed from a center of peacetime production into the greatest war production area to be found anywhere on the globe.

This transformation is still far from complete. But so much has already been done in that direction and so much more is visibly on the way that the story constitutes one of the great industrial epics of all time. And in these months of great trial it is also one of the most heartening stories of the war. For what Detroit has done and is doing is proof that America can win and potentially is already winning the crucial Battle of Production.

All over the Detroit area plants and factories which represent American industrial ingenuity at its most audacious, have been springing up. Other plants, built long ago (one as far back as 1904) are rapidly being converted to uses far removed from those for which they were originally designed. When the process is completed the volume of war production rolling off the assembly lines in the Detroit area will be greatly in excess of the peak production in peacetime. In a period of only a few months more men and women will be employed in the making of planes, plane parts, engines, guns, tanks and other war material than were ever employed here in the making of automobiles, refrigerators and other products for which Detroit is famous.



Detroit's great factories which two short months ago were producing automobiles, refrigerators and similar items, today are grinding out the tools of war. From the assembly lines now come bomber engines (above), tanks, military trucks, and other equipment.

Circus Site Used

An unused field where only a year ago the Ringling Brothers' circus pitched their big tent is today the site of a factory turning out parts for bombers, fighters and observation planes as well as shell and cartridge cases and parts for tanks. What was a cornfield as late as March 17, 1941, is today occupied by a plant operated by an automobile firm which is today engaged in turning out anti-aircraft guns, a weapon of extraordinary fire power which is designed for the protection of naval and merchant ships against dive bombers. At Willow Run, Henry Ford has plowed up many acres of soybeans and leveled many additional acres of woodland to make way for the greatest single manufacturing plant the world has ever seen, a structure so gigantic that the mind can hardly encompass it. Still incomplete (ground for the plant was only broken less than a year ago) it is already turning out airplane parts and before long will be turning out four-engine bombers capable of carrying the war to Hitler and Hirohito. When fully in production, which may not be far off, the number of heavy bombers which will come off the assembly lines from this one plant alone each month will be in excess of the total monthly production of all types of planes from all American aircraft factories at the time of the fall of France.

Facts Are Breathtaking

There is nothing in the Detroit area or, for that matter, anywhere else to match the miracle of Willow Run. Statistics tell only part of the story, breathtaking as these statistics are. It is not enough to say that the total floor area at Willow Run, including hangars, amounts to several million square feet and will accommodate, when fully in production, over 100 thousand workers all under one roof; that 25,000 tons of structural steel went into building the framework and that adjacent to the factory is a landing field of 720 acres on which have been built concrete highways which, if laid end-to-end would make a single roadway 44 miles long.

These figures lose their force in the telling. Willow Run must be seen to be appreciated. Yet fully as impressive as the fantastic size of the plant is the remarkable engineering skill, the elaborate planning, the bold imagination that went into its construction. In comparison with the complexity of a modern four-engine bomber a passenger automobile is like a child's toy. There are, on an average, only 15,000 parts in an automobile; a four-engine bomber has 488,193 parts which include 300,000 rivets, each of them requiring separate handling. To adapt mass production methods which proved so successful in the manufacture of passenger cars to the production of heavy bombers is no easy task. What is being done at Willow Run, in the Detroit tank arsenal and in the other great war plants in the Detroit area is to adapt the assembly line technique to the production of intricate precision instruments where the tolerance limit frequently goes to as low as 2-50,000ths of an inch and sometimes even lower.

As one production man pointed out to the writer: "You can't just wave a magic wand and have a gun come out from an assembly line." Nor an airplane, either. Yet by the application of automobile production techniques to the production of planes and tanks and guns, wherever and whenever these tchniques are capable of being applied, a very considerable saving of time is being effected in the manufacturing process with the result that production is steadily being stepped up. Reduced to its lowest common denominator, the process consists of simplifying to as great a degree as possible the highly complicated processes that go into the production of war material. In part, this is being done by replacing hand labor by machines; in part through the simplification of labor operations so that semi-skilled labor can be employed where hitherto only highly skilled labor could do the job; in part through the discovery and application of more efficient methods of assembling the completed weapon, be it plane or tank or gun.

Thus wing assemblies which not so long ago were practically being turned out by hand are now being stamped out by giant presses, some of them taken over directly from the motor industry, some specifically designed for the purpose. In one machine-gun plant the rifling of a gun barrel, at the outset, took an hour. Now 24 to 55 barrels are produced in an hour. In that same plant the overall production time per completed unit has been cut by 25 per cent and is about to be cut further.

Conversion is a term one encounters at every hand in the Detroit area. Plants which used to turn out automobile bodies are now turning out tanks and engines; one great automobile factory is now turning out powerful aircraft engines; another tanks, still another antiaircraft and anti-tank guns. These instances can be multiplied endlessly. By no means all or even a large part of the machines used in the manufacture of automobiles are being put to the new uses. Some of them fitted in perfectly with the present production needs; others have been adapted; still others have been coated with grease and put away for the duration. To an increasing extent, however, the plants themselves are being used for war work. Thus, 87 of the 90 General Motors plants in the United States are now working on war jobs. The magnitude of the task assigned by Uncle Sam to that one great firm is seen in the fact that it has war orders totaling six billion dollars, which is several times the normal annual production.

If the conversion of machinery to war uses is proceeding as rapidly as circumstances permit and the conversion of plant sites is moving at a very encouraging pace, the most spectacular conversion, job, in some respects, is that having to do with labor. Not only have the overwhelming majority of workers in the Detroit area had to be trained to do the new tasks required by our gigantic war effort but production plans call for such a staggering output that many more men—and women—will soon be employed in the factories of the Detroit area than were ever employed there in the heyday of the automobile.

Train More Workers

With both present and prospective needs in mind the companies have all stepped up their training programs. The Hudson Training School, for instance, now offers instruction in 68 different machine-shop operations. The Briggs, Willow Run and other plants in the area all have their own special schools for workers. The General Motors Institute has set up facilities for training men to staff divisional schools which in turn are being expanded to take care of the training needs of the various divisions of General Motors. In most instances the time of training has progressively been reduced so that today a six weeks' course has proved sufficient for workers in many branches of aircraft production. In some categories, however, highly skilled machinists, for instance, an actual and potential shortage exists. The skill required by such workers cannot, under the most favorable circumstances, be acquired overnight. That is why industries in these parts are combing the labor market for competent workmen who can either be employed directly in production or in the training of others. The need for machinists was emphasized in dramatic form the other day when the Hudson company advertised for "machinists from 45 to 98."

Face Labor Shortage

The industries in the Detroit area are also conscious of the fact that as their production increases and as the armed forces grow in size and drain off the younger men from industry they may soon be facing a labor shortage. Already labor employment figures in Detroit show a steady rising curve from the low reached in February after the production of automobiles was halted. When the peak is reached perhaps twice as many may be employed in war work as were ever employed here in civilian industries. It is hardly surprising, then, that more and more women are being brought into the war plants. One of them, producing machine-guns, is already employing 40 women to every 60 men and the percentage of woman workers is rising.

Because they fall into the category of military secrets actual production figures of the Detroit area plants cannot be published. What can be said, however, is that in one plant after another that was visited by this writer in company with other newspapermen on a recent WPB tour of this region is well ahead of schedule. Thus, in the Detroit naval arsenal the production of antiaircraft guns during the month of February was three times the number called for by the earlier schedule and four times the number produced during the previous month. A Chrysler plant is turning out antiaircraft guns faster than those weapons have ever been turned out before. For the first time, in fact, guns of this size are being made on an assembly line. The tank plant, about which a great deal has already been written, is also far ahead of schedule and, with almost effortless ease, is shifted from one type of tank to another.

It is an impressive sight to see these metal monsters, each weighing 28 tons, rolling off the assembly line. Yet it took only five months from the time the ground was broken for this plant until the moment when the first tanks were completed. A large General Motors plant, which once made medium-priced automobiles, is now nine months ahead on its production schedule. It is manufacturing powerful aircraft engines for the Army Air Corps. These are not isolated instances but typical of what is happening in the Detroit area as a whole.

Good News

The automobile industry faces a terrific challenge and is meeting it with daring, intelligence and speed. The same spirit animates the workers. One large plant engaged in essential war work was placarded with the slogan: "If the winning of the war depended on your work, would we win the war?"

The answer which the workers are giving, in terms of devotion to their work and actual output, is a resounding yes.

Some day it will be possible to write in specific terms of what the individual factories in the Detroit area have been doing these last months. It will make an inspiring story. For the picture of production in Detroit and its vicinity is well summarized by Capt. A. S. Wotherspoon, U. S. N., inspector of ordnance in charge of the Hudson arsenal.

"It might scare hell out of the enemy if he knew our production figures," he said.

On the World Battlefronts

German tanks and planes alone are able to decide great battles."

Werner sees the Germans with two objectives—Moscow and the oil of the Caucasus. Both, he said, present enormous difficulties. The Moscow front, he says, is now stronger than it ever was.

"As for the campaign for oil," he continues, "it would represent the most risky enterprise Hitler has ever taken on. Hitler does not need the road to the Caucasus—he needs the Caucasus itself, with Baku's oil, and he needs them this year. Should the Wehrmacht get beyond Rostov, in an attempt to break through toward Stalingrad, Astrakhan and Baku, it would be confronted not only by strong forces, but also by steppes and deserts and mountains. The German front would be exposed to Russian counter-blows from the north, the east and the south."

Werner says that Russian morale is high, and that there is no danger of the Red Army being shattered.

"On the other hand," he says, "a crisis in German Army morale is in the making. The German soldier will embark on the superbattle of 1942 in a mood very different from that of the 1941 invasion. The ranks of the youthful Nazi warrior generation in the Wehrmacht have already been thinned. The nerves of the German soldier on the eastern front are strained to the breaking point. He is still fighting tenaciously, but he has been inwardly shaken.

"Hitler will start his great offensive in the spring—and it will be beaten back. The Wehrmacht may meet with another initial success, but halfway through the battle death will present its bill. The failure of the German offensive, can and must then become the turning point of the Second World War.

"For the result of the coming superbattle in Russia will have the strongest possible repercussions in the Pacific. Unless Hitler Germany can win victory, it is lost. But if Germany is lost, Japan too is lost . . . A German defeat is bound not only to paralyze Japan and gravely impair its morale, but to finish Japan in a military sense. For the Red army in Europe and the British fleet in the Atlantic and the Mediterranean will have been relieved, while the United States can then concentrate entirely on the Pacific."

Werner says that the war against Japan must be waged actively and that the Chinese must be greatly strengthened for a counter-offensive.

"But Japan can be beaten in Europe, too," he adds. The timetable of the war in Europe deals in shorter time than that in the Pacific. The war in Russia is a highly intensified war, swiftly devouring the very substance of the Wehrmacht.

"As early as the fall of 1942 the Wehrmacht will reach the first limits of exhaustion, with total losses since the beginning of the Russian campaign at seven to eight million men. If the Red army maintains its combat power, the Wehrmacht cannot stand more than another 18 months of warfare in Russia. Revenge for Singapore can be taken at Kharkov and Smolensk. The decision against Hitler Germany is a decision against Japan, too."

This Capital of Ours

By Gerald G. Gross

One of those dime-in-the-slot movie machines Jimmy Roosevelt is identified with for a while has doubled attendance at the Interior Building Museum. For all its splendid dioramas, paintings, scientific models and historic maps, the place was pretty dead—as far as patronage was concerned—until a short time ago when Curator Harry L. Raul put in the jukebox cinema. Visitors, of course, don't have to drop a coin; the device runs automatically and continuously, the featurettes ranging from bear shooting with a camera in Alaska to cherry blossoms in Washington's Potomac Park. Today the museum has two browsers for every one it had before and at lunchtime particularly is the place—including the free movie—well filled. A few days ago a film depicting life aboard an American battleship enjoyed a large audience, composed chiefly of young ensigns who, assigned to desk duty in the Navy Building across the way, are getting as much of a closeup of a dreadnaught as many of them will ever have, probably.

National Archives, too, is taking on new life. Press releases, mimeographed and bearing release dates and everything, are beginning to issue from the thick-walled, forbidding fortress of documents in the Federal Triangle. Last week No. 5 and No. 6 were sent on their way to newspaper desks, which was two more than were released all of last year. The numbering starts from the establishment of National Archives in 1934, which give that agency an annual average of three-quarters of one handout. Not the least remarkable feature of the publicity renaissance is the fact that it comes at a time when all other departments and bureaus are reducing their press release output because of congressional clamor. (The Interior Department's information section was abolished by the House when it passed Mr. Ickes' appropriation bill the other day.) Anyway, Archives Press Release No. 5 heralds the transfer to its vaults of original census schedules for the years 1790-1870. No. 6 is a 5½-pager, all about the value of microfilming as a space saver and the ways Archives is doing its bit by serving the war agencies.

Washington reportedly has the highest insanity rate in the country. Maybe this is one reason: The Aquarium is in the Commerce Building but comes under the Interior Department and yet, trying to reach the fish sanctuary by telephone on Thursday, we were rebuffed by the Interior and Commerce switchboards, only to get our party by dialing Republic 6620—the Maritime Commission!

Federal Public Housing Authority and Farm Security Administration admit to being right proud of the job they have done in shepherding into an Arlington County trailer camp the 125 Negro families who had to abandon their shanties because the land was needed for road building. The camp is in "Queen City," half a mile or less from the new Navy Department Building. The trailers, large enough to accommodate four persons, rent for $3 a week. Large families requiring a second trailer get it for another dollar. A clergyman is overseer, the resettled tenants seem quite content and, in short, FPHA-FSA are very happy about the whole thing, the more so because from the beginning it looked like a delicate experiment.

WASHINGTONIAN OF THE WEEK

His family wanted him to be a minister, he preferred the legal profession, and so Elmer Louis Kayser is celebrating his twenty-fifth anniversary as a teacher. Next Saturday Dean Kayser will be honored on his quarter of a century allegiance to George Washington University at the alumni association's annual spring luncheon.

Dean Elmer Kayser

Young, spirited and as enthusiastic as he ever was about people and events, Kayser is good for at least 25 more years. He is only 45 years old, which would make him something of a prodigy when he joined the G. W. U. faculty at the age of 20 as an instructor in ancient history. Born in Georgetown, in a house that was his father's birthplace and where he lives today, Kayser had been graduated from Western High School and helped work his way through George Washington U. as a substitute teacher in public schools and later as a student assistant under his patron, the late Prof. Charles Swisher. He went through college in three years, then avidly accepted a $550-per annum appointment as a history instructor who had to double as assistant librarian.

At 21 he was elected secretary of the university. In 1930 he was made director of university students and four years later, when a deanship was created for this post, Kayser was named to fill it. His charges today number approximately 2000 young men and women who are now working for degrees. Down the years he has retained his class in ancient history, a subject which somehow seems out of keeping with a professor at the controls who is as up to date as this morning's newspaper.

He is a much sought after public speaker, delivering more than 150 speeches a year outside classrooms. Mrs. Kayser is the former Mary Ludlow, daughter of Representative Louis Ludlow of Indiana. They have a daughter who is a student at Cathedral School.

Music Clubs and the Festival Idea

Editor's Note—The ninth National Folk Festival will be held coincident with National Music Week this year when The Washington Post Folk Festival Association presents eight programs (2 daily) at Constitution Hall, May 6, 7, 8 and 9. Helen Harrison Mills, Chairman of International Music Relations of the National Federation of Music Clubs, sponsor for National Music Week, is enthusiastic about the Festival and has written the following article about it.

Mrs. Mills has been Chairman of International Music Relations for this federation that represents thousands of American music clubs for a number of years. She introduced American music into 47 other countries in programs and festivals. At present she is concentrating on exchanges and interchange of music with Latin American republics and promoting a series of broadcasts on the music of the Good Neighbor Countries.

By Helen Harrison Mills

The Folk Festival affords one of the most colorful and entertaining ways of presenting authentic and educational cultural ideas. With the gaily costumed performers giving songs and dances and playing unusual, authentic instruments, the festival happily integrates people of many races and regions that make up the huge "melting pot",—the U. S. A. At all times, the festival is a substantial contributor to American Unity—never more vitally needed than in our present crisis. Nowhere else in the world are so many completely different nationalities housed under the roof of a single government.

H. H. MILLS

The American Folk Festival had its original inspiration in people indigenous to this soil—the Indians. Next came early colonists—British, French, Spanish, German, Scandinavian. The types we think of as really "American" include mountaineers, cowboys, descendants of pioneer settlers and the Negroes. All of these brought their own backgrounds, and developed, revised ideals and standards of living. More recently "new" Americans came from Europe—Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Lithuania, Russia ,Rumania, and other countries—to become fused amicably and lastingly into the fabric of the republic that is the last stronghold of democracy. If this democracy is to survive, what more effective means to achieve this than a festival to which these various groups bring their traditions and folklore and sing and dance for each other?

For some time the Federation of Music Clubs has advanced the cause of folk music in programs and pageants. We have urged State Federations to present more folk festivals at their conventions and send groups of native singers and dancers whenever possible to the National Festival in Washington.

Our organization also has launched a Loyalty-Through-Music-Crusade. We now call it the Western Hemisphere Crusade, which calls upon 5000 members of our music clubs to present folk programs each year and use native talent. The program has a three-fold purpose: (1) to emphasize the vital need of an all-out spirit of loyalty on the part of every person in the United States, to recognize individual responsibility for all "newcomers" to our communities, and thus erect an impregnable wall of mental defense against subversive activities, using the folk music created by people themselves to express hope of better things; (2) to emphasize Good Neighbor policy by including all Latin American music, especially folk melodies, that can be secured and also to give them our music for performance:

A PAIR of energetic young Polish Dancers who are coming to do this and other dances in the May programs. They come from Milwaukee, Wis.

(3) to preserve the precious heritage of folk music of all lands—upon which has been built most of the world's masterpieces of musical composition—to do this particularly for those nations now so tragically submerged until such time as they may resume guardianship of their own culture.

The United States has become the world's military arsenal. It also is now the world's "arsenal of culture." Our clubs with their vast membership recognize this and sense the need for "keeping the music ball rolling." In our first World War there was community singing. It is time a similar project was developed for World War II.

Since Pearl Harbor, the federation has organized a Loyalty—or Victory—Community Sing which is as different from the "singing together" of 20-odd years ago as this war is different from World War I. It includes specific folk music of the universe—thus tying in with a folk festival plan. Through such events we aim to have folk music on all programs to familiarize people as a whole with such music.

From this effort we find States have developed original ideas. In Louisiana, for instance, a medley of folk tunes is played on the piano and is built from the songs members of the audience call out as their desire for inclusion in the medley. Then the group attending sing such of the songs as they know and are encouraged to learn others unfamiliar to them. Sometimes the audience is invited to guess the name of each song as it is played and the country it came from.

In Michigan, in addition to annual festivals in large centers, huge choruses of singers of many nationalities gather in different cities to sing their own songs in their own tongue before large audiences who "join in" from time to time.

In Pittsburgh at Christmas, the Tuesday Musical Club has a radio broadcast of folk music, with 20 nations represented in the groups that total 600 people. This year they repeated this program in the radio period of the Department of Justice's "I Hear America Singing," the same night.

The states nearest the Mexican border—California, New Mexico, Arizona, Texas and Louisiana, abound in festivals and pageants every year. In such far removed places as Maine, Wisconsin, the Dakotas, and Wyoming, folk festivals are increasing. Through such as these the "newest" Americans are being reached throughout the country. A Bulgarian woman member of one of the groups voiced this sentiment when she told a leader of such a festival.

"You cannot know what it means to me and my family to sing our songs with you and have you sing your songs with us. Now we feel that America is truly our homeland!"

At this time it is specially important to stress the part music can play in our Good Neighbor friendliness. Ever since the State Department called a special meeting in 1939 to discuss Inter-American Relations as concerning music, our Federation has accelerated exchange programs with the other 20 American Republics. These efforts on our part meet with collaboration, such as the sending of Maria Ceicao de Barros Barreto of the faculty of Brazil's Institute Brasil-Estados in Rio de Janeiro, to our convention in Los Angeles last June. She came to study our club organizations and their work to build similarly in Brazil.

Part of this Inter-American work by our clubs consists of Latin-American music programs, broadcasts and festivals. As a result many of their folk melodies have become definitely popular here already.

Vice President Henry A. Wallace should be given the credit for originating these ideas which are energetically being put into effect by our clubs all over the country. Music undoubtedly is an international language and we have found it proven already that the people of Latin America are much more responsive to approaches involving culture, sentiment and feeling than they have been to economic overtures. In an event like the National Folk Festival, all three of these elements are most happily combined.

War to Test Ingenuity of Clothes Designers

By Amy Porter

New York, April 11 (Wide World).—Sally is as patriotic as anybody, but honestly, sometimes she wonders.

Like she said the other day to Joe. "Joe," she said, "what do you boys in the Army want with pink underwear? Honestly, I think it's a shame."

Joe, who was on leave, said he didn't want any pink underwear and none of the boys in his company did either. But Sally said she guessed she knew what she was talking about because she'd been reading in the papers where it said there wasn't going to be any more pink underwear for people like her because the needs of the Army had to be taken care of first.

Furthermore, she'd heard there wasn't going to be any more yellow and yellow was her favorite color.

Also, what was the use of her saving money for a down payment on a fur coat when she'd heard tell that by the time she had the money there wouldn't be any more of the kind of fur she wanted to buy, on account of the Army again?

And, of course, silk stockings. Just look at the ones she had on; cost $2.50 and a run already, and her last pair, too.

The last, the final straw so far as Sally was concerned, was this latest business about how she couldn't even have a pocket on her coat. Why was the Army picking on her like this, and what did they expect her to do, run around in sackcloth?

Joe, who knew a lot of the right answers, said: "I don't know why you worry, Sally. You'd look pretty in anything you put on."

Good Answer in Any Case

Maybe so, Joe, and a good answer in any case. For the real style headachce isn't Sally's. She will make out all right. The real headache belongs to the people in the fashion industry, struggling to find something for Sally to put on.

They're thinking of putting Sally into pants a good part of the time—even on the street. The pants may be a reprocessed wool or cotton. They won't be yallow, not after this year they won't—too bad, Sally. You'll be lucky if they are dyed any color at all, and luckier still if they are a fast color.

So far, shortages have been just talk to Sally, except for stockings. When she shopped for Easter clothes she didn't have much trouble finding what she wanted.

But now, what should she do, start hoarding? Sally can't hoard—she hasn't the money. She wouldn't hoard anyway—she knows it would be unpatriotic.

There's still another reason for not hoarding, which Sally will realize if she's farsighted. When new-born fashions begin to appear in the shops probably about a year from now, she'll want to buy them, won't she, to be in style? By that time she'd be positively ashamed of obviously prewar clothes.

No, Sally might as well relax, and let the fashion industry figure it all out for her.

The industry must and will find solutions, because Sally's little clothes headache is a life-and-death matter to them—a revolution, in fact.

Manufacturers can see their way clear for the next three to six months. Present stocks will last that long. But after that, shortages will be a fact and not a rumor.

After that, style-makers will stand or fall according to their ability to keep Sally clothed for the duration.

Some Designers Totter

Already some powerful designers are tottering on their thrones. Nettie Rosenstein, one of New York's reigning dressmakers, has closed up her $200-per-dress shop because quality materials and $200 customers both are fading fast away.

This doesn't mean Miss Rosenstein has thrown in the sponge. But she has started another, altogether different kind of business over on Seventh Avenue where less exclusive manufacturers operate. Here, she says, she'll run up dresses for the average woman at more or less average prices, using substitute materials where necessary, less expensive labor, less hand-finishing.

It's a gamble for Miss Rosenstein—but for Sally it's good news. It means all Miss Rosenstein's experience with quality styling may be put within Sally's reach at last.

All high-priced shops are featuring "economy" styles, "basic" dresses to last for the duration, at lower-than-usual prices. Even custom dressmakers, like Mainbocher, who make clothes only to order for wealthy society and theatrical people, have reduced prices somewhat.

Charles Armour, who started the "dress suit" style—a dress with its own jacket—used to make clothes almost as expensive as Hattie Carnegie's. But, he says, he saw the trend several years ago and shifted to a lower price bracket. Now he's taking materials when, where and as he finds them, making costumes to sell for a moderate—for him—$25 to $50.

He isn't worried by the War Production Board's announcement of a "frozen silhouette," nor by the plan to forbid putting jackets over dresses.

Ready to Use Ingenuity

Armour's an opportunist, ready to pit his ingenuity against wartime restructions. He's experimenting with unbleached fabrics (dye being on the shortage list.)

He's sponsoring culottes designed for street wear because he believes that the return to bicycling plus the trend to practicality will cause a big swing to pants by fall.

This summer he proposes formal daytime suits made of washable black poplin (instead of the silk faille he'd have used two years ago), and trimmed with frilly lace collars and cuffs.

But even as the war shaves prices and brings better styling within purse range of more people, it raises the price of less expensive clothes. The Department of Commerce says prices are up 25 per cent over a year ago. Fabrics are costly and scarce, labor high. Almost certainly Sally's going to learn to sew at least a little bit for herself. She's going to take the advice of the Office of Price Administration and start relining coats, retrimming dresses, reknitting her own sweaters and generally making the most of what's she's got.

Many clothes luxuries are going to be taken from her—metal buckles and earrings, hand embroidered pink slips, zippers and rubber-soled shoes are disappearing from the stores.

But in every case the fashion industry is thinking of a way out. Belts will look as well tied as buckled. Earrings will be of pretty plastics or of sterling silver (non priority so far), and so on through the long list of shortages.

Styles at the end of the war will look quite different—as different probably as 1919 looked from 1914. But the chances are Sally will like the new look better than the old.

Any Kind of Dye Precious

She's right about pink lingerie. There'll be very little of it, probably, because dye—any kind of dye—is precious and needed in vast quantities for military uniforms.

Fast dyes—called vat dyes—are extremely scarce. So prints are to be made against white or unbleached grounds. And the patterns will be scattered—that is, the pattern will not cover more than 50 per cent of the ground.

But will Sally know the difference? Probably not. She'll like the new cool-looking patterns.

A true bright yellow will be hard to get, and the colors that use yellow—green and brown—may be scarce, too. Navy blue will be restricted. Reds will be plentiful. Blues, in shades other than true deep navy, will be available.

The scarcity of fast dyes is so acute, the Federal Trade Commission is taking the matter up, and will decide whether or not informative labels must be put on all dyed merchandise.

Silk, of course, is practically gone, but rayons and acetates are growing prettier daily. The hosiery makers vow they'll have high-grade rayon hosiery ready to fill the gap left by the loss of silk and nylon, while cotton mesh hose and cotton socks probably will become the style for all but dress-up occasions. (Sally and a lot of other girls are just waiting for a chance to go bare-legged.)

Sally won't freeze in the wintertime, either, despite the shortage of wool. Not only will there be reworked wool fabrics, but there'll be truly warm cotton coats, too. Velveteen, padded with cotton batting, is warmer than you'd think possible.

Army Gets Sheepskin

So far mouton (sheepskin) is the only fur the Government has confined to Army use and as things look now Sally will be able to buy a fur coat of some sort, if she has the money, at least for another year.

Shoes and hats are the most ingenious of anything in the wartime list. As fur felt grows scarce, casein felt—made of milk—will take its place. Knox plans to present a few casein hats for summer, and more of them next fall.

But who needs felt anyway to make a hat, when there's string and straw (plenty of this so far from Latin America), and cotton and wood (Lilly Dache plasters one hat with wooden shavings enameled to look like sequins)?

The supply of shoe leather is limited and its price is rising, but fabric and straw, formerly used for play shoes only, are taking on formal importance. Sally won't want to wear anything else with her pretty summer cottons.

You can expect an announcement soon about a new substitute for patent leather which makers believe you'll like better than the original. The substitute, of a non-priority plastic, can be washed off without dimming its shine, it won't crack, and for some mysterious reason it's not so hot to wear as real patent.

Low-heeled shoes and all-occasion slacks are assuming tremendous importance, not because of shortages but because they fit into wartime life.

Rush to Uniforms Slackens

Production of young, inexpensive evening dresses is increasing, however, because the girls the soldiers court will and should dress up, war or no war.

The rush to uniforms for women has slacked off.

All the worrisome-sounding limitations on styles shouldn't worry Sally. The "frozen silhouette" means only that waistlines and hemlines will stay pretty much where they are.

Styles will be fewer and simpler, it's true, but that won't hurt anybody's looks, least of all slim Sally's.

Vincent Coppola, designer of superlative suits, insists: "Enforced simplification is a blessing. It is the function of the creator to tune up simplicity. I'm convinced the war will discipline but not hamper the evolution of styles."

Samuel Chapman, evening dress designer, agrees: "It's up to us designers to make the simple old-fashioned fabrics charming—the plain batistes, and muslins, the sprigged organdies—and to turn even practical daytime fabrics, like gabardine, into glamorous evening clothes."

But sackcloth, did you say, Sally? Don't be silly. You certainly won't be wearing sackcloth. The Army needs it—all of it—for sandbags and camouflage coats.

National Symphony's Annual Campaign Begins Wednesday

By Edward Ryan

Since Pearl Harbor Washington's National Symphony, to the pleasant surprise of its members and supporters, has been playing to audiences some 20 per cent larger on the average than before the war.

This jump came the week after December 7, and continued through the rest of the season—a phenomenon that is scarcely all to be attributed to Washington's growing population.

The symphony group, like its British and Canadian counterparts likes to believe that more people went to the winter concerts primarily because of the fact that war increase individual tensions which for some persons only music can dispel.

And now, starting this week, the symphony will put their belief in the theory that music is a wartime necessity to the test—the crucial test of seeing whether Washington will contribute $114,000 to support the orchestra for another year of winter and summer concerts.

Their campaign starts Wednesday and will continue for 10 days. the goal is slightly larger than last year's figure of $107,600. There are three main reasons for the larger budget: (1) an increase in musicians' pay (2) the fact that the budget for which the money is being sought includes for the first time expenses connected with the Watergate concerts in the summer, and (3) other increased costs which affect the symphony's expenses.

The fact that the National Symphony intends to pull none of its musical punches because of the war will be welcomed by many Washingtonians. Of course the symphony is hoping that their welcome for this news will be hearty enough to stimulate the donation of cash, despite rising taxes rising costs of living, and the like. Their hope is backed up with a wealth of optimism.

For example, in announcing their campaign, the officers of the symphony point out that they are conducting their sustaining fund campaign "not in spite of the war, but rather because we are at war."

"As a Nation at war we are engaged in a titanic struggle to preserve those good things which have been created under our democratic form of government—and not the least of these is music.

"As a Nation at work, we have need, not only of relaxation and escape from the pressure and anxieties and tragedies of our every-day life, but, more important, of inspiration to carry through our jobs with courage and determination. And one of the greatest powers for inspiration is music.

"More than ever before we have need of the contributions that music has made to the civilization we are fighting for. For that reason it is vitally important that our great symphonic organizations should endure, so that they may continue to give relaxation, courage and inspiration to the people, not only of Washington, but of the entire United States."

In that appeal, the Symphony implies a broad reference to the war experience of our Allies, and presumably our enemies. Public orchestral performances have gone on continuously in England since the war began—having cleared the first hazard of widespread feeling that music was a luxury for which there would be not time or place in war.

Here are some of the high lights of British war-time musical experience, according to a study by Ward French, president of the Community and Cooperative Concert Association, which supplies concert series to communities throughout the United States and Canada.

London's promenade concerts went on despite the blitz, and after their auditorium was destroyed by bombs, the orchestra moved to another and played to audiences as large at 10,000 at a time.

Following the trail of exiles from the worst-bombed communities, many of the larger English musical organizations have for first time toured the smaller communities to which their audiences had moved.

When war first came there was a musical blackout which lasted perhaps a month—then was ended under the pleas of musicians and listeners alike. While the British Broadcasting Co. orchestra was discontinued, the London Philharmonic and London Symphony have both continued.

The London Philharmonic won its wartime status through a unique stunt. Faced with the prospect of folding up, the symphony went on a tour of England under the strategical supervision of Jack Hylton, and so successfully helped itself that the government decided to help the orchestra with a grant of funds.

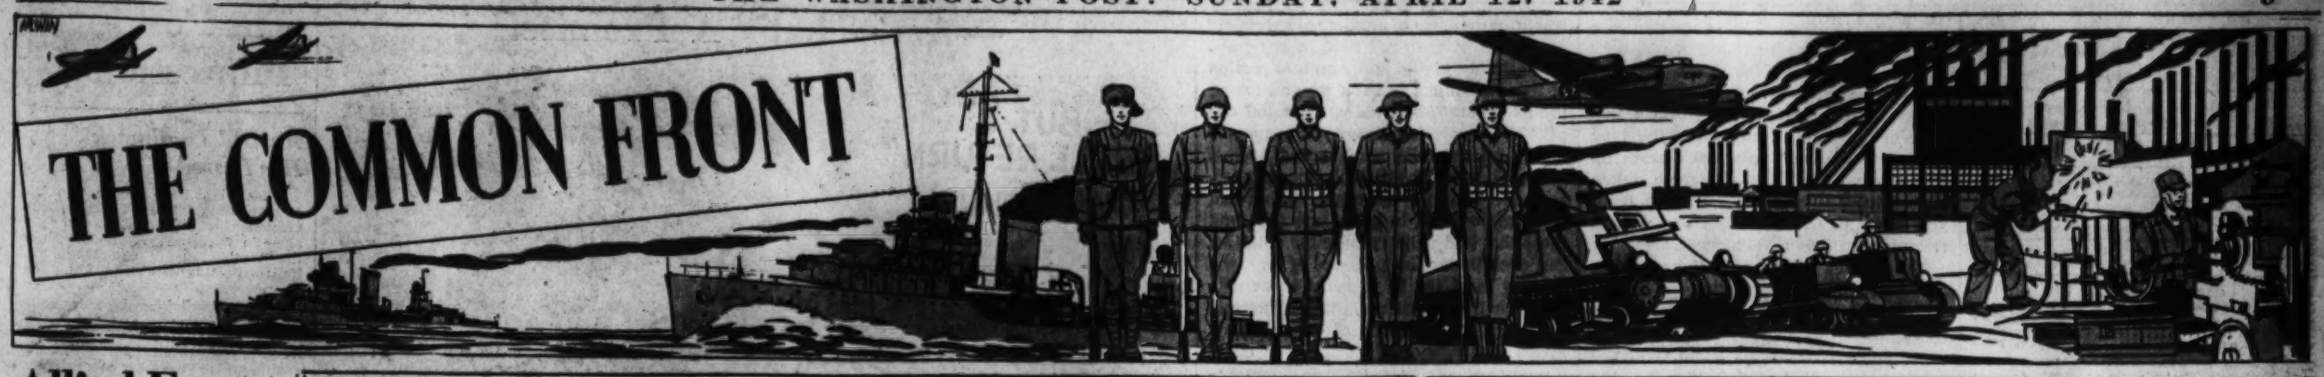
Another organization called the Pilgrim's Trust which sponsors concerts in smaller cities in England, has continued its work so successfully that they, too, won a government boost.

The same has happened to the pianist, Myra Hess, who has frequently performed in Washington, as soloist with the National Symphony. Early in the war she announced a series of lunchhour chamber music concerts, and since then has played an unbroken series of five concerts a week—more than 500 in all. When the blitz grew too heavy, the concerts moved underground, but they continued. The government contributed to support the concerts, and conferred the title of Dame on Miss Hess.

The continuation of music in warring England gives the National Symphony officers perhaps as much hope for the future of their organization as the increased attendance for their Washington concerts.

One thing apparently gives them no hope at all—the experience English orchestras have had in obtaining government grants. "We haven't heard a whisper of that here," one official reported. And that brings up the main point of the message the orchestra campaigners will start telling Washington music lovers about Wednesday:

The National Symphony feels that it is no longer merely a giver of joy to music lovers, but that it is a public service in the best sense of the term. But, like such other public services as universities and libraries, it cannot depend upon its earned income for maintenance—it must appeal to public support if its work is to continue.



Allied Forces At Darwin Are Poised For Action

By H. R. Knickerbocker

Darwin, Australia, April 11.—The impression that the Japanese may by-pass Darwin grows as time goes on, but this does not affect the fact that the sword of the Allied defense here is being sharpened to a razor keenness and the Australian and American troops are being toughened to the limits of human endurance.

Twenty-four hours in the life of an observer here may give some indication of what goes on in a community exclusively military, entirely devoid of feminine society, and based on a town which lies totally deserted on a barren coast open imminently to enemy raids.

The first act of our 24 hours is the most cheerful. It consists of a band concert by Americans. It is held in the open after dark, and beneath tall eucalyptus trees, several hundred soldiers, both Aussies and Americans, gather to hear it.

The musicians are all young American soldiers and they play with their rifles by their sides. Electric lights from current supplied by a dynamo in a truck throws curious shadows on row after row of tanned faces wrapped in ecstatic enthusiasm for the music they hear so seldom.

No Entertainment

Remember that these boys have no movies, no theaters, no clubs, no magazines, no sports—literally no entertainment for their business is the almost 24-hour job of preparing for an assault by a savage opponent. The band plays well, and after each number it is applauded enthusiastically. The favorite, for which the Australians cried out loudly many times, seemed to be "Piggly Wiggly Woo," or "Boogly Woogie Piggie," depending on which of two schools they subscribed to. At the end of the program the musicians shouldered their rifles and went off to their stations.

After a breakfast of oatmeal, bacon, marmalade, bread, butter and coffee, our colonel joined us for an inspection tour which took us along Darwin's sapphire waters and through the ruined town and down to the wharves and then along many long roads covered with red-brick dust.

Through it shoots Aussie motorcyclists like demons, bronzed and glistening in Darwin's shattering sunshine. American and Aussie trucks crash along at terrific speeds and over it all lies the cloud of dust.

We pass mile after mile of various kinds of camp, looking for all the world like those famous photgraphs of our Civil War encampments, save for the fact that vehicles have entirely replaced horses.

Aussies Are Tough

Down in the swampy section, it looks like pictures of Malaya with Aussies threading the narrow paths. Everywhere the Aussies are route marching, and 15 to 20 miles daily is their usual stunt. They are as tough as any soldiers in the world are tough and the only ones who could be tougher "this side of the ocean" are those whom our friends insist on calling the Yanks although one of their senior officers is from South Carolina.

En route we dropped in on the Australian Army News, one of the best edited and printed service newspapers I've ever seen. I was given a present of a special edition issued the morning of December 8 with headlines which still make one's pulse beat faster—"Japan Declares War on Great Britain, United States; Hawaii and Philippines Severely Bombed; Japanese Fleet Off Singapore."

It also quoted an article by a well known American expert on Japan which asserted that when the news reached Washington that the Japanese army was moving into Indo-China "American naval experts declared that at last Japan was sticking her neck out—way out."

It was sad, indeed, to turn from that to today's issues of the Army News and read that "the Japanese are believed today to be within 50 miles of the Burmese oil fields," but cheer returned when we set forth and viewed once more the incredibly sturdy figures of our men who looked as though they could handle at least one and a half Japs apiece even though our military authorities do frown upon underestimating the enemy.

Lunch today was the best so far, with baked sugar-cured ham and raisins, boiled potatoes, creamed string beans and, to the general amazement, ice cream. The amazement grew from the fact, well known throughout the regiment, that we didn't possess an ice cream freezer. Under questioning, the cook admitted that he had manufactured one himself. Colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and I, after enjoying its product, went to view this marvellous machine. The outside container had been a box for "aiming circles," which is part of a sighting apparatus. The handle was made of a tent stake and the handle off a meat grinder.

Twenty minutes for lunch is our custom and immediately thereafter we headed for Darwin to find a judge who was said to have insisted on remaining at his post after everyone else had fled before the Jap bombs of February 19, and left behind them a deserted and looted city.

We stopped on the way to Darwin to view the unique site of a modern hotel erected by two airplane companies to house their guests. Now the building was deserted and plundered, but with its electric lights and water still operating. It is not badly damaged and a couple of thousand dollars could retore it to its former luxurious state.

When we went to the court to look for the judge he wasn't there. Instead we stood and gazed at a desecrated courtroom. A quarter inch deep in red dust the big empty room seemed to cower in shame beneath the great seal of Great Britain over the judge's chair.

Beneath a shattered window lay the judge's robe, now torn. Papers lay flung about and from them it appeared that the case on trial when the court fled concerned the title to a gold mine.

I walked back beneath the dusty, dismayed courtroom and went into the jury box. There before each juror's seat lay a Bible. One of them was open. I scanned the page and my eye fell on that awful sentence, "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord. I shall repay."

The Japanese have run up a large bill so far, but there is no doubt it will be paid.

How Do British People Feel About Churchill Today?

The Argument Against Him

Labor M. P. Hits at 'A Legend;' Says British Consider Premier Paralyzed by Defense Psychology

By Aneurin Bevan
Labor M. P. for the BBW Vale Division of Monmouthshire
(Written for Wide World)

London, April 11.—I am told there is a legend in America. The legend is that the premiership of Winston Churchill and Britain's will to continue the war to final victory are so closely bound together that if one goes the other goes with it.

This is either an illusion of distance, a by-product of wartime censorship or the result of the vividness of American reporting. Probably it is the result of all three.

I suspect the legend is supported by an older one which has even less to justify it. This is the story—even Churchill now believes it—that his was the solitary voice raised in British politics for a stand to be made against the menace of fascism.

Like most legends, it is a fairy story with just enough fact to give it verisimilitude and a strong dash of self-interest to keep it growing. In recent broadcasts, Churchill was careful to make a reference to it, like a good shopkeeper who keeps his best exhibit in the front center of the window. However, it is bad business to floodlight a doubtful article. Blemishes in this particular one are already being pointed out, and I should not be surprised if it is withdrawn to a less conspicuous position.

Grand With Back to Wall

There is no tendency in Britain to belittle Churchill's contribution during the critical days of 1940. He gave authentic and immortal expression to the dogged spirit of the British when they had their backs to the wall.

But let us be quite clear even about that. He did not create the spirit. He expressed it. If he had not done so, he would not have lasted a day.

In social affairs, people think that because water comes through a tap, it comes from it. So they think that their public spokesmen are sources of power and not only its expression.

The British people thought Churchill grand when he had his back to the wall. Now they are beginning to think he is leaning against it. And they can't see how the war can be won that way.

Churchill's oratory, which was the main source of his power, is now likely to weaken him. Rolling periods and heroic calls for what turns out to be unheroic action begin to pall and even look ridiculous, like a little man strutting about in a big man's clothes.

So Churchill, who was so short a time ago Britain's pride, is coming to be regarded by many as the chief source of her humiliation, and I have yet to hear of a statesman who survived that role.

Public Critical of His Cabinet

The chief criticism of Churchill falls under two heads: one is that as prime minister he is not trying to do his job, and second that as defense minister it would be better if he didn't try.

Take the first. For many months the country has been calling upon the prime minister to reconstruct his government on lines which disregard claims of party machines. He answered at first by saying he couldn't see anything wrong with his government or his policy and that he would not change either.

Outside himself and members of his government, nobody of any importance agreed with him. The press condemned him and Parliament kept up a daily criticism. People grumbled.

Altogether the situation is extremely unhelpful to the war spirit of any nation. In a fit of angry petulance, the prime minister challenged a vote of confidence, which he obtained with ridiculous unanimity.

All it proved was that the House of Commons had a greater sense of responsibility than the prime minister.

Within a few weeks Churchill had to reconstruct his government. His incapacity to realize the seriousness of his position was soon shown by the steps he thought it necessary to take. He tried to persuade Sir Stafford Cripps to take a minor position and then a few days later was compelled by the force of public opinion to take him into the war cabinet and make him leader of the House of Commons.

The only other step of importance was to dismiss Arthur Greenwood, deputy leader of the Labor Party, from the government entirely, a move which could only be justified if fundamental changes were intended. Greenwood is a much-liked person, and his removal in the circumstances has only irritated labor without impressing the country.

His Domestic Policy Disappointing to Labor

In the main lines of his domestic policy, Churchill differs in not the slightest regard from Chamberlain. He behaves like a stiff-necked Tory with the result that workers' support of the government is dangerously undermined.

He still retains it because men like Ernest Bevin remain in the government, but their reputation is beginning to suffer from the association, and while they may be able to carry official labor with them they might not long be able to pledge continued cooperation of the rank and file.

The best description of Churchill as defense minister is given by the military record to date. Much of it was inescapable by any man and there is no tendency to blame Churchill for all of it.

But he fails to inspire confidence in his assessment of the military situation because events quickly falsify his predictions as in the last campaign in North Africa. Also his frequent references to the possibility of invasion cause British people to believe he is paralyzed by a defense psychology against which he periodically reacts by an ill thought-out attack.

So it is not because the will to victory of the British people is weakening that Churchill is not so strong as he was.

It is because they, the British people, feel he is not fighting the war so robustly as he did. If he falls, America should bear this in mind and fear no weakness here.

The best thing I could say of Churchill is that he would prefer to have it that way.

The Argument for Him

Conservative Says Fall of Churchill Would Be Great Nazi Victory

By Flight Lieut. Hamilton W. Kerr
Conservative M. P. for Oldham
Written for Wide World

London, April 11.—Why is it that the critics of government, when denouncing its ministers, its policies and its conduct of the war, always hastily add: "Of course, I'm not attacking Winston. I want him to remain as prime minister."

Incongruous, you may say. How can a prime minister be good and the government bad? I think the answer is simple. The prime minister has the immeasurable asset of having been right about Hitler.

During those years in the thirties when people said Hitler was bluffing, that the German people never again would be able to face the horrors of blockade, that war would mean an end of civilization, Churchill stood up almost alone in Commons, and from a corner seat below the gangway made those historic speeches telling an incredulous world of the growing evil in its midst.

It was like the tolling of a great warning bell on a sleepy summer afternoon. Gradually its deep insistence caused passers-by to pause, listen and read its message.

Then when the time of testing came he had the courage to tell the truth. Democracy is supposed to like soft words, but no free people ever responded more generously to the promise of blood, toil, tears and sweat.

Politicians had forgotten that people will slave and sacrifice for a great ideal and like it.

His Words Roused Fires of Patriotism

During the battle of Britain when the German bombers were droning over our countryside day after day, the prime minister's speeches roused the fires of patriotism to white flame.

I remember being in an R. A. F. mess in south England on the day France fell. Few of us cared to speak. For years we had been taught to believe the loss of channel ports was one of the most terrible disasters war could bring us. An older generation still talked of the awful days of March, 1918, when it seemed as if our armies would be separated from the French and the channel ports must fall.

Somebody switched on a radio. The prime minister was speaking. By the time he had finished each of us felt like we had drunk a bottle of champagne. People laughed. A new look had come into their eyes. We felt ready for the worst.

The prime minister has the instinct of a great military leader who shows himself to the troops in the front line where the battle is the hardest. Thus indomitable Clemenceau clambered through the mud of trenches to talk to the poilus in 1918, and thus Churchill walked through the rubble and debris of our cities on the mornings after great aerial bombardments.

You speak of the past, you may say, but what of the future?

Can Churchill bring Britain to victory?

I believe so. The fact is that no living statesman at present in office knows as much about war as Churchill.

Critics say he is autocratic and headstrong and he will not listen to his advisers. But of course he has his faults. He is too big not to have big faults. But refusal to listen to advice is certainly not one of them.

The prime minister has listened to all of the wisest criticisms. He has appointed a leader of Commons. He has increased the number of members in the war cabinet who have no departmental duties. He has not appointed a minister of defense for the good reason that the prime minister must be master in his own house and a minister of defense would in many respects enjoy greater powers than the prime minister.

Once before in British history a similar occasion arose. Lloyd George asked for a minister of defense in Asquith's cabinet. Asquith refused. When Lloyd George succeeded him he quickly forgot all about the idea of a defense minister.

His vision lies in the fact he thinks of war in a global sense. In the front line the soldier sees only his sector of the front. One commander reports enemy tanks are breaking through and there is a shortage of antitank guns. Another asks what happened to fighter squadrons because dive bombers are mercilessly pounding his troops.

But at the base the commander-in-chief takes in the entire battle at a glance. Colored pins show him the positions of his tank divisions moving up to counter-attack, others show interceptor fighters his troops cannot for the moment see, gunning vital supply lines of the enemy.

It is the strength of Winston Churchill that he sees the battle as a whole and never allows public clamor to move him from the main strategy.

He Has No Potential Rival

And finally no one in Commons can seriously challenge him either as a personality or a master of parliamentary forms. Nobody carries such heavy guns.

His opponents often seem like light scouting craft trying to zigzag within range to launch torpedoes in some vital spot. Then great broadsides crash and rumble and attackers retire behind the smoke screen of protective verbiage.

Cripps certainly soared like a rocket into the political sky.

I feel the position of the prime minister is sound. His prestige certainly suffered with military disasters. If ever he fell, I believe Hitler would have won his greatest victory of the war. But Churchill has only yielded the forward political defenses. The main position still holds—a base for vigorous counter-attack. And I do not believe the great guns will long be silent.

U. S. Marines Expected to Lead Attack on Jap-Held Bases

By Frank I. Weller
Wide World Writer

United States Marines are getting ready to uncork some mighty fierce surprises for diligent little Mr. Moto.

They gave him a sample at Wake Island. Now, they prepare for the day Uncle Sam points toward Tokyo and says, "get me some sea bases out there for what I'm about to do in a big way!"

No Jap can doubt that recent United States Navy attacks on the Gilbert and Marshall Islands cast a shadow of coming events—American ships and soldiers headed for his homeland. Mr. Moto will know it's the business when United States Marines start taking over island bases en route.

This is no blueprint of high command strategy. It is no military secret. It is the task to which every Marine confidently feels some day's reveille will summon him. It is his hope when taps signal the day's end of drill in strange, new maneuvers.

These innovations in military manual, and the "how, when, and where" of an expeditionary force, are the real surprises and secrets of the Marine Corps.

Some folks say that Marines—the world's most versatile and elaborately trained soldiers—are improving privately upon tactics just evolved by England's night-raiding "Commandos." Maybe so. They won't tell you. It would be odd if they were not, however, since for 167 years this oldest professional military unit in America either has introduced or perfected nearly every new trade of the fighting man.

Fight Anywhere

Traditionally, Marines are "sea soldiers" attached to the Navy, but they fight with the land forces, too, and on occasion have been mounted—"The Horse Marines." They are adept at every form of military activity.

Modern Marines go ashore as a small, compact but fully equipped army. They have airplanes, tanks artillery, antiaircraft guns, antitank guns, Howitzers, trench mortars, hand grenades, automatic rifles and machine guns. They are called the best bayonet fighters afloat.

John Craige, retired U. S. M. C. captain, says the "overwhelming probability" is that Marines are going to be used in this war as the "land-fighting arm of a ship-air-shore team for overseas action."

According to his theory it is possible that naval and air forces will blast Jap way-stations to Tokyo, and the Marines will seize and hold them for use by great convoys of combat troops and supplies moving to the attack.

And there is where the Marines would pull their surprises, whatever they be. Certainly something extraordinary is in the works. The corps concedes that for months it has practiced secretly with every type of amphibian tank it could find. Only the Marines know whether these seagoing land monsters will work.

Largest Motor Barges

They have what is believed to be a fairly effective amphibian ship-to-shore tractor, and the world's best motor barges for landing troops, tanks, guns and supplies under enemy fire. They are expert parachute soldiers. They have improved on every trick of aerial attack the Germans employed on Crete. They have stepped up landing speed and mobility.

Asked if the Marines learned anything from the Commandos, Lieut. Gen. Thomas Holcomb, commandant, stiffly says "the Marines have been commandos since the days of John Paul Jones!" This is subject to some debate, inasmuch as Marines normally land, attack, seize and hold enemy posts until sailors and soldiers take over. Commandos simply attack, destroy and retreat.

However, both operate under supreme command of the "commandant"—hence the term, "commando." the latter dress in black, darken their faces, fight silently, use every guerilla method and strike only at night.

The Marine is a long-term professional soldier. War is his job. He works at it all the time. Marines have fought somewhere, sometime during 72 of the last 140 years. They have made 200 hostile landings on every continent save Australia.

Marine history started on November 10, 1775 when, in reply to George Washington's request a handful of merchant seamen were recruited at the old Tun Tavern on the Philadelphia waterfront to form a "Continental Marine Corps." They were to be "ship soldiers" in the tradition of the British navy—all expert swordsmen, marksmen and cannoneers. All had to be "of dependable and religious nature combined with robustness of body."

John Paul Jones stationed them in the Bon Homme Richard's fighting tops—fore, main and mizzen—with orders to pick off British ship officers and gun captains.

Here, Marines worked the first of their long list of surprises. "I have not begun to fight!" Jones replied when the vastly superior Serapis grappled the Richard and riddled it with cannon shot. His sword flashed a signal and Marines let loose with their muskets and hand grenades.

Thus began the legend of the Marine and his rifle. Since that day Marines have made a fetish of rifle shooting. "Take away his rifle," says an old legend, "and you have only half a Marine left." His rifle is the Marine's personal weapon from the day he enlists. He keeps it at his side always—not in any ordinary gunrack where anyone can use it—lavishes on it his affectionate attention and care, knows its shooting idiosyncrasies, Marine Corps marksmen have won 15 of the last 26 National Rifle team matches.

"Squirrel hunters," they called them in the last war when at Belleau Wood they popped off Germans with a prowess that dumbfounded and turned back the enemy. "There," said Gen. Perishing, "was the Gettysburg of the World War."

"Wood of the Marine brigade," surprised French renamed the place, although Marines were only one of 82 units to fight there. They waded waist-high in wheat against hidden German machine guns at Chateau Thierry—merely looking for a mark to shoot at.

U. S. Forces In Panama Gird Against Axis Threat

By Chandler Diehl

Quarry Heights, Panama Canal Zone, April 11 (Wide World)—Every man of the United States forces on the isthmus at Panama is on active duty—manning anti-aircraft posts or making patrols—or on maneuvers as Lieut. Gen. Frank M. Andrews and his staff strengthen protection of the Panama Canal lifeline.

A trip of only 50 miles, into the interior of Panama, discloses activity everywhere along the way: infantrymen on maneuvers, armored units whirring along jungle roads, engineers on maneuvers and on vital road construction.

One sees signal corps companies installing additional telephonic communications; infantry and coast artillery posts on alert, trigger-fingers ready; planes landing and taking off from a desert dispersal field, and supplies going forward to advance outposts where detectors stretch their mechanical ears to pick up any buzz of alien propellors.

One sees all this—and more—in just 50 miles.

Seasoned Warriors

Panama appears alive with Uncle Sam's soldiers operating under Maj. Gen. William E. Shedd, deputy commander of the Panama Canal department. And the men are becoming seasoned, toughened warriors under the steady, hard work in a stern climate over rugged terrain.

The variety of terrain and climate is appreciable on even a 50-mile trip.

Soon after our party left a headquarters post, our jeep was purring along a road back-dropped with light jungle growth and heavy with military truck traffic.

Supplies were moving forward for men's dinners and for construction projects. Trucks were swinging off onto side roads that wind through marshy lowlands and up steep hillsides to outposts.

Antiaircraft positions and other outposts located behind such emplacements, we were assured, were free to concentrate all their energy on throwing a steel-jacketed curtain of defense over the vital canal. And the "jungle-mudders" under Brig. Gen. Homer Oldfield are just itching to try this death-dealing job on an Axis armada.

Battle Problems

Panama's mobile force under Brig. Gen. Robert H. Lewis, we understood, was working out a tactical problem set to Panama scale on the basis of actual battle plans for the jungle-lands of the Orient.

The soil was steaming a bit from an overnight rain and beyond town "Y" we found our route in the class of a quagmire. Here Army engineers had heavy construction equipment at work on an all-weather crossing, and our reconnaissance car bulled through on its own four-wheeled power and the driver's skill.

Then we reached roadway where the engineers had been before us and we sped along to a dispersal airfield just as two observation planes came gliding in after a bit of ocean-scanning.

Attack pilots at this field were doing the alert shift—waiting within reach of their planes for any call. The Air Corps, under Maj. Gen. Davenport Johnson, too, was ready (and hoping) for a chance to show its fighting power.

Thaw on Volga Begins; Russian Winter Is Over

By Eddie Gilmore

Kuibyshev, April 11 (AP).—The long Russian winter is over officially—because the ice in the Volga River here began breaking up last night with thundering cracks which we thought at first were antiaircraft guns.

A Russian friend and I were sitting in the hotel when it first came—crack, crack, boom.

"What's that?" I asked.

"Sounds like antiaircraft guns," he answered. "Let's go out and see."

Outside we looked for searchlights or shell bursts. There were none.

"What are the guns shooting at?" we asked an old man. "Have you heard a plane?"

"Oh, no," he replied. "It's 'lyod tronulsya' (the ice is on the move").

"Lyod tronulsya," gasped my friend. "Why then, winter is over."

Church And Tyrant

Bishop Eivand Berggrav of Oslo and three other Norwegian prelates have now been thrown into a concentration camp. Since concentration camps in Norway, like all other innovations introduced by the Quisling regime, are doubtless copied from Nazi models, this is tantamount to martyrdom, as in the case of so many German Christians, both Lutheran and Catholic. The imprisonment of the bishops is almost certain to be followed by wholesale arrests among the rank and file of the clergy, more than a thousand of whom have resigned their places in protest against the attempt to reorganize the Norwegian churches and schools on the totalitarian plan.

The struggle between church and dictator in Norway is following the pattern of the struggle in Germany. That is to say, it has resolved itself into a struggle for the souls of the young. Quisling's problem, however, is much more difficult than Hitler's. In Germany the conflict of loyalties cut through tens of thousands, possibly millions, of individual families; in Norway such conflicts as yet scarcely exist. The detestation of the Nazis and their native tools is so nearly universal that it can never be eradicated unless the very youngest Norwegians can be removed from family influences and subjected to some such regimen and indoctrination as the Nazis established at home. By the same token the Norwegian bishops knew from the Nazi example what must follow any disposition in themselves to compromise this vital point of parental control of education. It would mean, as it meant in Germany, the fatal step toward the extinction of the Christian tradition and of Christian ethics.

Hawaii's Japanese

There can be only academic interest now in the fact that a labor commission, sent to Hawaii nearly 20 years ago, reported back to the State Department that the Japanese there were a "military menace." Such claims have been made, officially and unofficially, for more than 40 years. Moreover, similar claims have been made about the Japanese in California. The interesting thing, however, is that while California's Japanese are being moved out of strategic areas, Hawaii's Japanese remain in our Mid-Pacific bastion. Some of them have been interned. But for most of them the prevailing island spirit is reportedly one of toleration. This, of course, is in line with civilian Hawaii's traditional attitude. Moreover, there is reason to believe that it accords with the exigencies of the situation, as sized up by the intelligence services.

For to exclude from Oahu all persons of Japanese blood would involve a mass transportation which, at present, would be unthinkable, considering the many thousands of persons who would be involved. Also, it goes without saying that such a move would cripple the island economy just when it must be sustained. Yet it is a fact that because of the prevailing situation on Oahu, it remains impossible to handle this country's Japanese "problem" with uniformity. This is to be regretted, for it is perfectly obvious that disloyal Japanese in Hawaii constitute a more serious threat than do their compatriots in California.

Congressional Tour

Members of the House Subcommittee on District Appropriations are making a commendable effort to see for themselves the conditions existing in some District institutions before attempting to write the city's 1943 supply bill. In the past personal visits to local institutions have been the exception rather than the rule. This year, however, subcommittee members appear to be giving such institutions as Gallinger Municipal Hospital and the Home for the Aged and Infirm a systematic once over. That is at least a net gain. The tour may well become a precedent to be followed every year before hearings on the local budget are held.

Yet it is crystal clear that legislators visiting large and rapidly growing institutions once a year will never become intimately familiar with their problems. Particularly at present, when demands upon many institutions are being multiplied and their costs of operation are soaring because of high food prices, they need week-to-week attention by the policy-making body. Increases which Congress allowed some institutions this year in the hope of improving the type of service rendered have been eaten up by higher costs. By the same token expenditures planned now for the fiscal year 1943 may subject men and women to hunger rations a year hence.

The obvious truth is that Congress can never satisfactorily function as a city council. If Washington is to rise above its reputation as a blotch on the face of democracy, it will have to undergo reforms far more sweeping than the expedient improvements which have been effected at Blue Plains. It will have to be given a local government that can conduct the business of the city efficiently every day, with close attention to long-range program and policies. The war has intensified and not lessened the need for lifting the Nation's Capital out of its unique status of political impotence.

Spirit Of Bataan

To the positive forces that go to make up our fighting strength we may now finally add the spirit of Bataan. Ever since General MacArthur began his determined fight to hold back the Japanese onslaught against the Philippines Americans have been inspired by the tenacity and courage with which our men have resisted greatly superior forces. General Wainwright continued the battle against still greater odds after General MacArthur had taken over his new assignment in Australia. All this is now an old story. Yet it remains fresh in the minds of Americans. And the final conquest of Bataan greatly sharpens our realization of the suffering, bloodshed and stark horror that have been endured for our sake.

"No army has ever done so much with so little," wrote General MacArthur in tribute to the men he left behind in Bataan, "and nothing became it more than its last hour of trial and agony." We have known for weeks, of course, that the little army could not hold out against the merciless streams of steel and explosives with which the Japanese have been pounding it. And none realized the hopelessness of their plight so well as the men of Bataan themselves. Yet they held their positions as long as it was humanly possible to do so. Thousands were probably annihilated; other thousands were wounded or were too fatigued and hungry to fight any longer. Yet amid the disaster that was overwhelming General Wainwright's army a force of 3500 sailors and marines was transferred to Corregidor and is continuing the hopeless fight from that battered fortress.

It cannot be said that the men of Bataan thus snatched victory out of the jaws of defeat. There is nothing resembling a physical triumph in the last stand now being made at Corregidor. But every American knows that the men of Bataan have given us the pattern that, if followed with the same indomitable spirit, will bring us victory in the end. For these American and Filipino soldiers have given their "full measure of devotion" to the cause of world freedom without in any way trying to measure the cost to themselves.

The tragic fact is that the heroes of Bataan were finally blasted out of their foxholes because we as a Nation have been painfully slow in disciplining ourselves for sacrifices that are insignificant compared to theirs. Perhaps we are now fully awake to the immensity and the perils of the struggle in which we are engaged. Certainly there should be no illusion left as to the hell through which Americans must pass to save our civilization from the shattering conquest that continues to spread over Asia and the Pacific. Yet we have scarcely begun to approach our war tasks in the spirit of Bataan.

If Americans are worthy of their traditions, this example of courage, fortitude and tenacity in the face of overwhelming odds may prove to be of even greater significance than the losses of time, equipment and men that the little Bataan army inflicted on the Japanese. For of one thing we may be certain: if all America is actuated by the spirit of Bataan, victory cannot be denied us.

Debts And Taxes

Former Governor Hobby of Texas has directed attention to the plight of those small businessmen who had counted upon paying off their debts out of future earnings, only to discover that earnings intended for that purpose are about to be absorbed by high war taxes. The firms on whose behalf he testified before the Ways and Means Committee last week are not those holding war contracts; rather they are engaged in businesses that are likely to show a loss of volume because of the war. If such firms are to survive, they must, of course, be in a position to meet their obligations as they fall due.

Debt arrangements antedating the defense program were made, as Mr. Hobby pointed out, without any allowance for the extraordinarily high tax schedules now under consideration. Sudden imposition of such levies would leave a good many small concerns facing foreclosure, liquidation or bankruptcy.

It is suggested, therefore, that tax relief should be accorded relatively small debtor concerns not holding war contracts, in the form of credits not exceeding 5 per cent of the total debt in any year. Those credits would apply on that portion of income subject to surtaxes and excess profits taxes. Admittedly, tax relief applicable to special classes of taxpayers has to be carefully safeguarded against abuse. It would be difficult, for instance, to distinguish between concerns that had been improvident in going into debt and those that had valid reasons for doing so. But even under the pressure of war, the country must try to preserve those efficient small business units that in normal times are the backbone of our economy. Firms that cannot assist the war effort directly are not, for that reason, nonessential. Some of them are supplying the necessities of life to civilians and the national interest calls for their preservation. If they can be saved from collapse by reasonable modification of rigorous tax laws, Congress ought not to hold back.

To Fight Inflation

Participants in the White House conference of last week reportedly called to discuss plans for combating inflation were the Vice President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Price Administrator, the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, and the Director of the Budget. The character of this gathering is revealing. For it suggests that the Administration is considering an integrated price-control plan that would employ most, if not all, of the diverse control weapons at its disposal. But we should not jump to the conclusion that its purpose is to set over-all price ceilings for commodities at wholesale and retail, freeze wages at existing levels, and establish rigid limits on profits. That kind of indiscriminate freezing of prices and earnings would be most unwise in theory as well as being difficult to enforce.

The problem of price control is not merely a matter of finding ways to curb an inflationary price movement. We know how that can be done; the knotty question is how to apply the brakes in expert fashion so as to assure public cooperation and avoid serious political repercussions. Prices could be kept down, without doubt, if taxes were increased sufficiently to absorb the estimated 15 billion dollars of excess purchasing power due to the war program. But Congress would not dare to boost the proposed 1942 revenue rates so high. Moreover, if it did so, irresistible demands for wage increases to offset taxes would probably throw all calculations out of balance and defeat the purpose of the tax program.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to decide first of all to what extent it is practicable to rely upon tax increases as a curb to inflation. There follows the closely related question of how to recapture untaxed excess income. Shall it be by appeals for voluntary investment in Government bonds or is it necessary to resort to compulsory saving devices to absorb additional funds? If the fiscal brakes of high taxes and forced savings were to be applied rigorously enough to recapture all excess income, the OPA would have a comparatively easy task. In that case, there would be no reason to fear general inflation, assuming that Congress would agree to establish effective control over wages and profits. The OPA could then concentrate upon the task of controlling the prices of specific commodities or groups of commodities that, for special reasons, might get out of line with general price movements.

When the Administration has arrived at decisions concerning the emphasis to be put upon these diverse instrumentalities of price control it will be in a much stronger position to urge prompt passage of comprehensive legislation to exorcise the specter of inflation. The initial lack of such an integrated plan gave Congress a more or less plausible excuse for passing the wretchedly inadequate measure under which the OPA is now operating.

THE BLIND DANCER

Down in the valley they are dancing on the green.
The pipes and fiddles crying, O,
The heels and toes are flying, O,
The youths and girls are vying, O,
The giddy legs careen.

O'Leary wid his capers, sure, will take the prize for fair.
He strikes the heath to win it, O,
A hundred times a minute, O,
His feet are shuffling in it, O,
Or dangling in the air.

No friendly hand advancing, O,
To guide me to the dancing, O,
Where I would lead the prancing, O,
And be the champion known.

The pipes and fiddles crying, O,
The heels and toes a-flying, O,
The youths and maidens vying, O,
And I who yield to none

Still More Names

The roots and implications of this war are so intricate that it is quite difficult to briefly characterize it.

Perhaps the War of the Chauvins or the Chauvinistic Conflict or the Chauvinistic Rebellion will be a significant challenge to present and future interest in the problem of world peace.

I believe that chauvinists are presently considered to be those nationalists who have an exaggerated or absurdly vain-glorious appraisal of their military, political or cultural virtues. They are wildly extravagant in their claims to racial and economic superiority. Therefore, they are peculiarly equipped to promote the salvation and happiness of the small nations and minority groups within nations. They are actuated by unreasoned devotion to their opinions or beliefs. Intolerance is their besetting sin.

If this be true my suggestion seems to me to be an apt description of the situation which made this war inevitable, and a significant clew toward the establishment of conditions which will contribute to world harmony.

Let us call it The Freedom War or War For Freedom. Are we not fighting to maintain our freedom?

The English, the Filipino, Negro, Jew, Catholic, Protestant, Chinese, and Indians are all fighting for the same goal. Freedom! All races, all creeds all over the world are intent on maintaining or regaining their freedom. To be free men, living in peace and dignity.

The intense desire for freedom is eternal and the day will come when that intense desire for freedom will evolve into intense action by the temporarily shackled peoples of Europe. Freedom will be the battle cry. N. RITZENBERG.

Bottle Menace

The announcement comes over the radio that beer is no longer to be available in cans but is to be distributed in bottles. These bottles are to be used and thrown away. Our streets are now ornamented with whisky bottles and to these are to be added beer bottles for the duration. Very frequently I walk along the streets and I see broken bottles scattered about and I think of what a terrible hurt might come to a child's bare foot, or the ruin of a precious automobile tire. Since the automobile driver is subject to severe penalties for any infraction of traffic rules, I think any person guilty of throwing glass bottles about indiscriminately should be made to pay dearly for it.

Return Souvenirs

In the campaign for salvage one potential source has been overlooked. I refer to the metal "souvenirs," mostly brass, which Japan has been selling to us down through the years mostly in the form of ash trays. As cigarette butts, ashes, etc., are now usually deposited in coffee cups—on your rugs or clothing—we would be well rid of them and could return them to the Japs with our compliments. The children could collect them in their vacation and it would be good riddance for many reasons. F. M.

Guerilla Warfare

It should now be quite evident to those who study the Russian strategy on the eastern war front why the Russians gain so little territory all the while that they are toying with the German resistance. Having the well organized guerilla bands behind the Germans to interrupt their long communication lines with the front, the Russians cleverly choose their own grounds and time for attack to decimate the opponents as it becomes evident that the much needed reserves and supplies destined for the particular sector had not arrived. There can hardly be anything more disheartening to an impoverished army than to be deprived of reinforcement.

One may rightly say today that ever since Hitler stuck his mustachioed head into the bear's den he has been waging a two-front war. But let no one think that this strategy had developed by accident. We remember well the Spanish revolution. While Hitler experimented with his new weapons in and over that unfortunate country he did not take the trouble to note the things Stalin's men were practicing there. Guerilla warfare is not comparatively new. Far-sighted war strategists during last fall must have realized then that the German advances, on such a wide front, were far too rapid to accomplish the army's objective. Even when the German hordes were gaining vast territory they were losing a historical war, by overlooking the "stupid" peasants and their cleverly hidden guns and ammunition.

No history of that battle will be worth reading without a full account played by the guerillas behind the German lines. Thus, the longer the lines stay long the greater the advantage for the Russians and disadvantage for the Germans. Hitler must now see that he gambled and lost, for he bought time with his 1940 pact with Stalin only to have England upset his schedule of conquests, resulting in a standstill today and certain defeat tomorrow.

6 Per Cent Profits

The public should not be misled by the proposals made in Congress and the Senate to limit profits to 6 per cent. Representative Smith, for example, who is trying to slash wages by abolishing the wage and hour law with its provision for the payment of overtime after 40 hours, has tried to give an appearance of fairness to his bill by adding a provision limiting profits to 6 per cent. The joker in this and similar proposals is that the 6 per cent is figured on the value of the contract, not on the amount of capital invested in the business. Consequently a firm might get contracts for four times or more the value of its capital, so that it would "earn" 24 per cent profit in the way profit is usually figured before the 6 per cent limit would come into effect. In fact, a company might complete within a year several such contracts, so that it would get several times 24 per cent before the "6 per cent limit" would be reached.

Convictions

Your editorial today on Lew Ayres pierces the sluggish blackness of men's dull rationalizing like a sparkling stem of hope shooting from some star so distant that one fears for its fragility.

I was unable to restrain my feeling of joy to find one resurrecting on this Easter Sunday the common heritage of man which everywhere seems to be supplanted by expediency. I am speaking of the "right of reason," the pure thought, the unbiased mind, the moments when man discards his arrogant prejudices and becomes heir to the "universal mind."

Only the other day I was discussing the subject of your editorial with a member of your organization. Indeed, how few realize that every man pays a fair price for the thing he wants most. No man has yet, or ever will pay too much nor too little for what he wants most. The confusion is that men seldom seem competent to fix a steadfast value on the things they want or the medium of exchange.

Few really know what they want, few have convictions at all! They haven't thought long enough or seriously enough to be convinced of anything. What they think they believe depends always on circumstances. Nor have they fixed securely in their minds in order of value the things they want.

Men are constantly swapping the things they claim to worship most for something they profess to be of less value! It is not that men lack courage . . . they lack convictions with which to prove their courage. But, to have convictions one must cultivate the art of evaluation and perspective. This art requires thought and thought requires effort . . . it is much easier to rationalize and call it thinking . . . besides few will know the difference.

It takes more courage to be faithful to one's own convictions when they are of the minority than when they are of the majority. Right or wrong, he who has convictions and in the face of all opposition and ridicule can be loyal to them is indeed a courageous and a superior man.

Thank you for your editorial . . . it does my soul good this Easter Sunday. PAUL A. STEINMETZ.

More War Names

In the selection of an appropriate name for the current war, consideration might be given to the following, which seem to have the prerequisites of aptness and brevity: The War of the Continents, or the War of the Hemispheres.

PHILIP MAURO.
Washington, April 8.

Name it the War of Liberation. Liberation from military oppression, brutal outlawry, religious persecution, despotic aggression, international strife, ugly barbarism, racial hatred, unbridled greed, venomous evil, cruel slavery.

GRENVILLE KLEISER.
New York, N. Y., April 8.

May I suggest War of Liberation, which briefly expresses our aims and purposes, is impressive and easily remembered.

It offers promise of liberation to all enslaved peoples abroad, and liberation to us in the United States from the trials and tribulations of war and a promise of a return to normalcy and the pursuit of happiness. FRANK MELVILLE.
New York, N. Y., April 8.

Many of the titles proposed for the war are merely attempts to name a cause for fighting which might justify our fighting at any time. They overlook the fact that somebody else started the conflagration with very definite objects. I would propose the Triple Conspiracy. R. C. WELLS.
Washington, April 8.

I suggest as a name for the present war, Anti-Axis War or Anti-Axis War I. Initials A-A-I, indicating a priority rating to which it seems entitled.

GEORGE V. WASHINGTON.
Charles Town, W. Va., April 8.

An Old Landmark Has Passed

What might have been a colorful, adventurous part of Washington environment met its Waterloo one year ago—on Saturday, April 12, when the Washington & Old Dominion Railroad closed its doors to the public.

Back in Civil War days the railroad track stretched from Rosslyn to the blue hills of Virginia. In those days—and until 1912—a steam engine pulled passenger cars merrily across the 52 miles to Bluemont. Then came electrification, but the atmosphere of the past still remained. Every day the Washington & Old Dominion Railroad—one of the last indications of the past in railroads—ran in to meet the new age until it was eclipsed by progress.

The little train would pull up to Rosslyn Station, sputter a little, squeak a few times, and swing into action. First slowly, then little by little it would gain speed until by the time it reached Falls Church it would roll in like a conqueror. Time was when a goodly crowd gathered to hail its arrival and to greet friends and relatives from the city. Until its last run they greeted it, but in fewer numbers and minus the hoops and bustles, the tight trousers and lace collars.

The train would hurry on to Dunn-Loring and Fairfax. If the weather was cool, Mr. John W. Kelly, the conductor, punched up the fire in the coal stove. He knew just how to keep the passengers warm for he had been doing it for some 20-odd years.

Swaying, crying, moaning, it would beat a steady three-quarter time as it followed its old familiar trail among pretty, rolling pasture lands, quiet forests and waters that snail over their snakelike stream beds. Here one would see an old stone wall with two viaducts, crumbling with age and its original purpose forgotten; there, an old landowner's estate, the mansion sitting high on a hill that sloped down to a lake where a white circular summer house was built over it; there ran a rail fence. Soldiers once marched over this land, determined and resolute.

On it would roll—Sunset Hills, Herndon, Oakgrove, Ashburn, Trap Rock, Leesburg, Clarks Gap, Purcellville. It would stop there for across its path was piled the ties that once held the rails to Bluemont, a summer resort 7 miles beyond. Off the train, one would find himself in the beautiful Loudoun Valley. A blue mountain range stood to the west, towering majestically above a slaughter house and creamery. In the other direction lay the town, part of it in colored stone, all of it stretching prosperously through the valley.

"You know a great deal about Purcellville—and the railroad, don't you?" I asked.

"Well, I'm not up on those things," he replied, and seeing through the window a man ambling down the highway, added, "There goes Mr. Nichols. He could tell you everything that's happened here since the time of Christ."

Mr. Nichols ambled on down to the drug store, where I overtook him.

"Your being a woman," he said, after being cornered, "you'd be interested in knowing that a woman named Hannah Jenny ruled the Goose Creek Quaker Church here for a long time. She kept ruling and the other women got ideas, so until this day they claim that the women in Goose Creek still have ideas of ruling.

"There used to be Indians all through here," he continued, "but the last of them were driven out in 1720. In the next ten years the Quakers and Germans began settling. It stayed pretty small until the railroad came through and made a town out of it."

"Wasn't the mother of the Wright brothers born near here?"

"Yes, at Hillsboro, about 5 miles from here." Then, not being interrupted, "a Baptist church here was the first to start the fight for religious freedom. We had some battles around here too—not very well known but they had their part. The one at Bull's Bluff is the best known.

"Women always like this story," and he glanced to see my reaction. "When Morgan's Riflemen came through, a 28-year-old soldier saw one of our girls. He fell in love with her on the spot. 'I'm going to marry that girl," he said. Eighteen months later when the war was over, he came back to the valley and married her. Their grandson still lives here."

"What about the railroad?" I asked for he had very carefully avoided the first question I had asked him.

He was silent a moment. Then, "We all hate to see it go, but no one seems to know what to do about it. It's a part of our life, you know."

Just then the train whistle blew and I hurried back. Mr. Ormsbee, the engineer, and Mr. Kelly, the conductor, put everything in order, and the little train started out bravely to take its last load of Sunday riders.

The return trip was interesting also. Passengers got on all along the way. Everyone looked serious except a few Negroes who broke the solemnity with careless sounding laughter. But the laughter was a "front."

"Yes, Lord, I've been praying," one of them said later. "I've been praying hard. Don't know what I'll do if the train don't run."

On the front seat sat an old man, gray, stoop-shouldered, product of a hard, somewhat limited life.

"I can't walk four or five miles to the bus over on the highway. I couldn't hold out now. Don't know when I'll get to town to see my sister any more."

"I just like the train," said an old lady. "I've watched it grow up. When I was a little girl. . . ." It ended there for something caught in her throat and the tears in her eyes betrayed her.

The Washington & Old Dominion train rolled bravely on that late Sunday afternoon—swaying, crying, moaning—hastening its sober-faced passengers to their destination. But it doesn't take them any more. An old landmark has passed.

CORA LEE CARDWELL.

ERNEST LINDLEY Economic High Command

One of the most encouraging developments in Washington is the interest which the President is showing in the economic effects of the war program. For the first time the prospects are fairly good of getting an agreement among the appropriate executive agencies on a war economic policy covering prices, taxes, installment credit, profits and wages.

For months, Government economists have been worried about the cost of living. There is general agreement that the moment is near, if it has not arrived already, when stringent measures must be applied to prevent a really serious inflation. But there has been no agency charged with looking after this vitally important factor in the whole war effort. The Office of Price Administration is concerned with price control and rationing. But prices cannot be fixed unless wages and salaries are fixed. The several agencies of the Government concerned with wages and labor problems have been dodging this question. Indeed, some of them seem to have been oblivious to it. Except for a few general remarks from the President at his press conferences, almost nothing has been done to prepare labor for the freezing of wages.

Taxation probably is indispensable to the control of inflation. But the Treasury persistently has failed to devise a tax program directed to the control of inflation. The latest Treasury tax plan hardly touches the smaller incomes, from which excess purchasing power must be siphoned off in taxes or savings. Moreover, Secretary Morgenthau still clings to voluntary sales of war bonds, has actually discouraged consideration of enforced savings. The Federal Reserve Board has been much more alive to inflation dangers, but its own powers are puny.

Drifting Into Inflation

For lack of a comprehensive, coordinated and tough economic policy, the country has been drifting into what might become a disastrous inflation. Fortunately, the President himself appears to be coming to grips with the problem. Economics has never been one of his strong points. But he is surveying the situation with the aid of such men as Budget Director Harold Smith, Vice President Wallace, Price Administrator Henderson, and Marriner S. Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve System, and other aides who are alert to the need for action.

A step lower in the governmental hierarchy are numerous economists who exchange opinions more or less continually. They are overwhelmingly agreed on the need for comprehensive action, even though, as is to be expected, they disagree on details. They do not have direct access to the President, who would undoubtedly profit from hearing some of the arguments, as he did in the days of his first brain trust in 1932 and 1933.

High Command Needed

In fact, the most dangerous gap in the whole executive side of the Government is on the economic front. The President needs an economic high command to confer with him regularly and set policies to guide the Treasury, OPA, and all other agencies concerned with the price level, the standard of living, and even the planning of postwar policies.

This high command should also direct an educational campaign, so that the Nation as a whole will realize that the Government has a consistent economic policy. Such a high command also should be able to give Congress intelligent guidance. Congress reflects extreme dissatisfaction with the economic conduct of the war. Congressmen lunge at the 40-hour week, at high profits, at this or at that. Almost certainly it will pass a sales tax, unless the Administration gets behind some other means of taxing lower incomes. The sales tax would be far better than the Treasury's avoidance of taxation in the lower levels. It may be necessary, anyway. But there are alternatives, such as the lowering of the income tax exemption combined with higher social security taxes and enforced individual savings by payroll deductions. At best, Congress is pretty sure to be a barrier to the adoption of a rounded and tough economic program. Its record on taxation is spotty and its handling of the price control bill revealed an extraordinary blindness to the urgency of the need.

Administration Must Lead

With an election coming in a few months, Congress may duck and dodge. But the Administration can expect nothing unless it takes the lead and makes a fight. Clear guidance from the White House would relieve the minds of many Congressmen. A program which would have some semblance of equality of sacrifices or hardship for labor, business, the farmers, and everybody else, should have a much better chance of enactment than a series of piecemeal measures. The authors of the Smith-Vinson bill understood this, and so combined a profit ceiling with restrictions on labor. The bill, as presented, was unworkable in some respects, unfair in others, but it was dressed up to look like equality of sacrifice.

For practical reasons, however, the Administration may have to take one thing at a time. There is probably no way of getting simultaneous action by Congress on taxes and wage ceilings, for example, whereas price-freezing can be achieved under existing law. The problem would be simplified if organized labor voluntarily agreed to a wage freezing to take effect whenever prices are frozen. Congressional action could follow at leisure. But this would call for a lot of education within the unions, many of which are still being encouraged to believe that wages should be increased to meet higher living costs. The blunt truth is that the war requires a sharp reduction in the standard of living. There will not be enough civilian goods to go around, excepting food and perhaps clothing.

Indeed, some forward-looking economists are talking of limiting the expenditures of every person in the country to fixed amounts weekly (apart from rent, insurance and other family overhead costs). Such an extreme measure will prove unnecessary; and, in any event, it almost certainly would be unworkable. But a similar result can be achieved by rationing combined with heavy taxes and enforced savings.

Whatever its details may be, an over-all war economic policy is being studied in the upper reaches of the Federal Government. For the first time there appears to be a chance of getting a program which will have the backing of the President and to which all of his subordinates will be bound.

MARK SULLIVAN Giving Comfort to the Enemy

This sequence of recent incidents, seen as a whole, goes to the heart of the problem of public morale, and hence of winning the war.

First, Representative Martin Dies charged that a Government board headed by Vice President Henry A. Wallace has among its employes 35 who "have public records which show affiliation with front organizations of the Communist Party."

To this charge Mr. Wallace wrote a public reply. The reply denied part of the charge. As to another part, Mr. Wallace countercharged Mr. Dies with "malicious distortion of facts" and "distorting the emphasis." However, the part of Mr. Wallace's reply that is pertinent here reads thus:

". . . the doubts and anger which this and similar statements of Mr. Dies tend to arouse in the public mind might as well come from Goebbels himself as far as their practical effect is concerned . . . The effect on our morale would be less damaging if Mr. Dies were on the Hitler payroll."

Next, the White House took notice of Mr. Dies' charge. One of the President's secretaries (acting, he explained, on his own responsibility) gave to the press a statement that the Dies charge had been mentioned approvingly in a propaganda broadcast put out by a German radio station.

'It Helps Hitler'

This note—"it helps Hitler"—ran through all the New Deal replies to Mr. Dies, official and unofficial. It was in some replies the only or main answer. An extreme example was the New Republic's: "We don't say Representative Dies is paid by the Axis, but we agree with Vice President Wallace . . ."

Now it is true such charges as Mr. Dies' encourage Hitler and do some service to him. They give apparent support to Hitler's frequent denunciation that we, with his other enemies, are a Communist-dominated country. (When Hitler isn't calling us Communist-dominated, he calls us plutocrat-dominated.) And it is true that circulation of the Dies charge in German propaganda broadcasts does some harm to us. It does not harm us in America—we have already read it in our own papers, and we don't care what the Germans broadcast. But it does harm our cause in neutral countries. And it does us harm within Germany, for it encourages the German people to think our morale may be bad. Morale is a definite factor in the war, as concrete as planes or guns. And whatever harms our morale, or seems to, is a help to Germany's morale, and vice versa.

But what is the answer? Is it to suppress Mr. Dies and others who utter criticisms of the Administration of a sort to give comfort to Hitler? This question cannot be answered, or even intelligently thought upon, without first inquiring to what extent the charges are accurate.

Without undertaking to pass on the present charge, a fair judgment about Representative Dies and his Committee to Investigate un-American Activities is that, in their work as a whole, they have unearthed many facts and conditions which, if not unearthed, would have done serious harm to the country. About the essential truth of most of the Dies Committee's revelations from the beginning some three years ago there can be little question. This settles any suggestion of suppressing Mr. Dies or his committee. In America we aren't going to suppress truth because it gives comfort to Hitler, or for any other reason.

But a fair judgment would also say that Mr. Dies lacks discrimination, and that he seems not to understand, or not to observe, the rules of legal evidence. In consequence he has in some instances done serious harm to innocent persons. Mr. Dies has uncovered several "front organizations of the Communist Party" and by that has done a service. But these front organizations are made up of two quite different kinds of persons. One consists of those who know the organization is a "front" for the Communist Party. The other consists of innocents, the dupes of the first group. And it is unfortunate that Mr. Dies sometmies gives out lists which fail to distinguish between the two categories.

Epithets No Answer

But, neither to the Dies charge nor to any other, is it an adequate answer merely to cry "Nazi," "Hitler," "Goebbels." Such epithets ignore the truth and substance of the charge or the issue. Answers of this kind are made to all sorts of criticism of the Administration, not only about conduct of the war but about wholly domestic matters. When demand arose to change the law fixing a 40-hour work week, the answer of the wage-hour administrator was that "the Nazi propaganda machine is behind this whole movement" . . . House Speaker Sam Rayburn suggested that the movement would "make the headlines in Berlin and Tokyo."

When a committee of Congress was investigating construction of an "information center" in Washington, suggested by the President, a Democratic Congressman asked, "Don't you think it is giving aid and comfort to the enemy to attack the motives and decisions of the President in times like these?"

The phrase, "aid and comfort to the enemy," is an old formula to describe what should not be said or printed or done. For the purpose of censorship, the phrase should be divided. To give "aid" to the enemy, in the form of military information—news about troop movements and the like—is obviously harmful. No one can defend it, and no responsible writer or public man would claim the right to do it.

"Comfort" to the enemy is a different thing. A rule which would bar statements giving "comfort" to the enemy would prevent any mention of defeats or setbacks. Under such a rule, there could have been no mention of Pearl Harbor. Such a rule would prevent any criticism of conduct of the war. It would prevent criticism of any domestic policy of the Government. It would reduce a country almost to the silence of the totalitarian governments of Europe.

If such a rule were faithfully lived up to we would be obliged to call off the campaign for elections to Congress now about to begin, for the arguments of the campaign necessarily will include criticism of the Administration in power. The mere holding of an election will give comfort to Hitler, for it will enable him to say, and exaggerate, that there is cleavage in the country.

We had best confine our prohibition to that which gives "aid" to the enemy, and not attempt to proscribe what is said to give "comfort." And we had best get away from answering argument or criticism by such epithets as "Nazi," "Hitler," "Goebbels."

CARL SANDBURG

What Would Lincoln Do Now?

"It Is Difficult to Say a Sensible Thing Nowadays"—ABRAHAM LINCOLN, APRIL, 1864

WHAT would Lincoln do now? Would he find the conflict between invested capital and organized labor as tough as the slavery issue of his own time? As Chief Magistrate of all the people he would hope, of course, to smooth out the differences among honest men, not to mention dealing with those he had in mind when writing, "Actual war coming . . . every foul bird comes aboard and every dirty reptile rises up. These add crime to confusion. Strong measures, deemed indispensable, but harsh at best, such men make worse by maladministration."

His own party then he saw split 40 ways on what to do about slavery. Through this chaos of clashing ideas Lincoln had to ride. Every day came pressure and he had to say Yes or No. And in these pressures did he have a choice between right on the one hand and wrong on the other? Hardly. Day after day and hour on hour he had to decide between what was partly right and partly wrong on the one hand and what on the other hand was partly right and partly wrong.

Many a time when making his decision he admitted it was partly wrong but it was the best he could do. He had a word for this. He would point to what he would like to do that would be perfectly right and then show how what was perfectly right wouldn't work—in the end it would get worse results than another course which he termed "expedient."

Not merely day after day but month after month and year after year the two leading and most widely circulated newspapers of the country challenged, attacked, belittled Lincoln's course of action or inaction. Those were the New York Herald, conservative and hating abolitionists, and the New York Tribune, radical and anti-slavery. And the Herald nearly always saw Lincoln going too far while the Tribune hardly ever failed to find fault with Lincoln for not going far enough.

ALSO day after day Lincoln was the target of slander, scandal, misrepresentation, vituperation, lies, false rumors, half truths, insinuations, lampoons, caricatures from a free press that hated him and his ways. They poured it on him. He took it meekly and bowed low before it. He took it with laughter and cheer at times when on the face of it a lie couldn't get by. He writhed and twisted when he knew it harmed his cause and that of the boys who had answered his call to service. That was his mood when in Philadelphia at a Sanitary Fair dedication in April of '64 he said, "It is difficult to say a sensible thing nowadays." So much of what he had been saying was tortured into something else that he didn't mean. A hundred voices and as many journals over and again used the word "imbecile" to describe his administration.

When a military authority, without asking Lincoln about it, shut down a treasonable newspaper with a neurotic editor in Chicago, an editor at a later date declared by a jury to be "mentally unsound," Lincoln said nothing, did nothing. When cool-headed friends of Lincoln in Chicago pleaded with him to revoke the military order and let the Chicago newspaper run its free presses again, Lincoln issued the order so the newspaper was again free to spread sedition and teach treason.

Widely published was Lincoln's little query, "Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts and not harm a hair of the wily agitator who induces him to desert?" That is a terrible question. It carries its own answer. It was in the minds some some of the men who joined mobs that wrecked or burned a score of newspaper plants, dailies and weeklies, and came to no punishment from local or Federal authorities.

LINCOLN now might not be hearing from supporters that he is "slow," "vacillating," and from enemies that he is "imbecile." And again he might. Human impulses have not changed particularly. Certainly the politicians of the various sections and factions play the game much the same.

The good woman Ida Tarbell read a thousand books on Lincoln and after years of studying him she said it is impossible to make either merely a saint or a hero out of him—he was too human, too wide ranging.

The words "responsible" and "responsibility" stick out from many of his letters. And he liked the word "thorough." He thought freedom worth men's dying for but he would like it that free men could understand their freedom would be safer if they felt responsible about it and could be thorough in their work as freemen.

Often amid chaos and howls of shame and guilt he sat cool as death writing memoranda on what it was immediately possible to do. Or again as when news came of a valued friend killed in combat the tears ran down his face and after the slaughters of two lost battles he was in grief near to agony. In one lull after a disaster he was full of jokes and told one fool story after another till he heard a question why he could be so lightminded, when he answered, "My God, man, don't you see that if I didn't laugh I would have to cry?" His personality held a wide range of the tragic and the comic. Perhaps democracy can best survive where men know the right moments for complete and solemn reverence or the nonsense that nourishes and the laughter that rests and may even heal.

Lincoln now laughs. The ghost of his laughter is part of our inheritance. The people, who stood with him when the politicians in Washington wondered what was the matter with their constituents, understood he was laughing their own corn-on-the-cob mirth that helps when things go bad sometimes. Not until peace came did he allow himself to smile for a photographer. And behind the smile was a haggard weariness.

THERE were many fool talkers and writers in Lincoln's generation. They let themselves go. They had a good time and indulged their passions and their hate. Today their words look pathetic or ridiculous. We may read the Congressional Globe of the 1860's with amazement at how large a majority of Congressmen did not know the history in the making before their own eyes. We feel sorry they had such loose mouths and so little care and anxiety as to how their utterance would look in the future.

Lincoln was one of the few who had precisely and deeply that care and anxiety about what he said or wrote. He could be musical of speech but there are times when he hedges and cribs and confines what he is saying till it seems crabbed and clumsy. What is he doing? He is circumscribing the area where he says he knows something for sure. He is taking care to mislead no one. So the people over the States trusted him when the Senate and the House and the New York Herald and the New York Tribune and the London Times didn't. He foreshadowed something. The people took him as a new figure of hope for them. This hope ranged around wider freedom, political and economic, for the common man. It might be long in coming. But Lincoln held the lights and the high torch of it.

THE people of this and many other countries take Lincoln now for their own. He belongs to them. To many the word "freedom" or the word "democracy" is hard to get at. And the Constitution, sure we're for the Constitution, though we're not sure what it means and we have even heard of lawyers who don't know what the Constitution means and they prove it by arguing and disputing about what it means.

But Lincoln—yes—he stands for decency, honest dealing, plain talk and funny stories. Look where he came from—don't he know all us strugglers and wasn't he a kind of a tough struggler all his life right up to the finish?

Something like that you can hear in any nearby neighborhood—and across the seas in far continents. Millions there are who took Lincoln as a personal treasure. He had something they would like to see spread everywhere over the world. Democracy? We can't say exactly what it is but he had it. In his blood and bones he carried it. In the breath of his speeches and writing it is there. Popular government? Republican institutions? Government where the people have the say-so, one way or another telling their rulers what they want? He had the idea. It's there in the lights and shadows of his personality, a mystery that can be lived but never fully spoken in words.

WESTBROOK PEGLER The Fay Mob

Tucson, Ariz., April 11.—Here are some social and personal notes about some officials of the International Union of Operating Engineers, an A. F. L. group embracing the men who operate digging and hoisting machinery on construction jobs.

Harry D. Jones, of Akron, Ohio, the boss of the locals in that area and a vice president of the Ohio State Federation of Labor, who has been a dirty criminal practically all his life, has lost his appeal and has matriculated at Ohio State Penitentiary in Columbus for some post-graduate work in the studies which prepared him for his distinguished career as a unioneer under the illustrious leadership of William Green.

Brother Jones hired two poor saps from Oklahoma to blow up some buildings under construction in which C. I. O. workers got the jobs which, otherwise, might have gone to his union. These brothers mistimed one of their firecrackers and it killed one of them. Before that, Brother Jones had procured the destruction by a bomb of a steam shovel on another job, but he was not tried for that one. Although the charge of malicious destruction of property, on which Brother Jones was convicted, sounds rather trivial in the case of a union gorilla, it will be seen that the Jones thing in Akron was really quite dignified because a man lost his life.

Four Convictions

Brother Jones had run up a record of four convictions in preparing himself for his position as a colleague of Brother Green in union leadership. One was a small larceny job; in another he stole a horse and buggy and thereafter he was convicted of sexual offenses against two young children.

He got three consecutive sentences of from one to seven years each on the present charge, surrendered on March 11 and is now No. 79182 in that type of institution in which so many other prominent unioneers received their training.

Brother Jones' fellow unioneers in Akron fronted for him promptly when he was arrested and denounced Alva J. Russell, the county prosecutor, as an enemy of labor. Nevertheless, because of the heat, they had to pay lip service to the law and so said they would cooperate fully in running down the dastardly dastards who had done this evil thing which, of course, they heartily deplored. However, they never did anything to help Mr. Russell and he got the conviction in spite of their noncooperation in this important process of orderly Government.

Just about the time that Brother Jones was learning his way around the new school in Columbus a bomb blew the front porch off the home of Bernard E. Hagesfeld, the business agent of two locals of the engineers in Lakewood, near Cleveland. He is a lieutenant of Frank P. Converse, the boss of the engineers in Cleveland, whose home also was bombed in 1933 and who was shot by persons unknown in 1935. The Cleveland police are baffled, of course, but one of the Cleveland papers has taken occasion to observe that such disturbances are not mere incidents in a private feud within the great and noble family of unioneers and to hope that anyone who knows anything about the event will inform the authorities.

Dangerous Drunk

This fun in Cleveland followed by a few weeks the dismissal in Syracuse, N. Y., of an indictment against Joe Fay, one of the vice presidents of the international or parent union, for slugging a minor official of one of the upstate locals named Orville Warner.

Fay is a dangerous drunk who has been getting away with union rackets for years in collaboration with the mob of candle-burners who follow Frank Hague in Jersey and it was he who slugged David Dubinsky of the garment workers that time when the A. F. of L. was holding its annual convention in the appropriate surroundings of the New Orleans Hotel run by Seymour Weiss, the boss thief of the old Long mob, who has just been bowed out of prison on a commutation by the every-loving and forgiving United States Department of Justice after serving a brief fraction of the term imposed. Fay took personal offense at Dave's proposal that racketeers like him be eliminated.

He kicked the whey out of Warner and got himself indicted on a felony charge good for five years and this time our hoodlum friend was really scared. But he hired a mess of very distinguished and expensive counsel and on the day of the trial, well, what do you know? Brother Warner he ain't there to press the charge. Nope, Brother Warner is absent, so when one of the distinguished lawyers had the cold, unsmiling gall to tell the court that the gorilla's services as a unioneer are vital to the national defense, why, the judge he turned Fay loose.

But stick around, because one of these days the whole story of this mob of political unioneers will curl your hair. Gov. Lehman has turned loose the New York State attorney general's office on Joe Moreschi's crooked mob who run the hod carriers' racket, which has extorted about $3,000,000 from poor stiffs all over the country on defense jobs, and if Gov. Lehman is really shooting, the same investigation can turn up the Fay mob which is deep in the crooked politics of New York City, because Fay's mob and Moreschi's work together like the Axis.

The Japanese Mind

By Herrymon Maurer

In the old days in Japan, a member of the noble samurai class could walk down the road, whip out his sword, and—if it was his whim—slice off the head of a commoner. From the family of the murdered man there would come no protest; the murder was not even murder. For a noble was a noble, and a commoner was only an instrument of his will and desire.

Today, even in a Japan far different in government and in buildings, in industry and in surface customs, the state could order mass suicide in the most unreasonable of forms. Indeed, in a certain sense it has already ordered mass suicide.

In China, however—ancient or modern China—if an official ordered an unjust tax, or put forth harsh edicts, he would run up against plenty of opposition. There would be meetings, complaints, protests, denunciations. Wronged citizens would howl to heaven for justice before the very gates of the official's home. Shops would close; markets would be boycotted. And if oppression continued unabated, the official might one morning find his own house in ashes about him. What is more, the people's opposition would be everywhere considered proof not of their unruliness but of the wickedness of the official.

In short, Japan has always been a nation regimented to the will of its masters; China has always been a land of individualists. Perhaps no single fact can explain so completely not only the course of the China war, but also the sequence of events which has followed Pearl Harbor.

For the Japanese militarists have made great plans and have foisted them onto their uncomplaining commoners. They have given orders; the orders have been obeyed. Soldiers have fought as they have been taught to fight. If a plan could be followed, they followed it. Even if it could not be followed, they still followed it. Civilians have made sacrifices as they have been ordered; they, too, have followed the plan. Right now that plan seems to be working. But the war in China has shown that the plan can suddenly blow up and go to pieces.

For no matter how great the panzer divisions of Japan, no matter how many the tanks, the guns, the planes and the ships, once the plan is broken—once each soldier is forced back on his own judgment and his own sense—then Japan's armies have given way. At the same time, China—land of em-battle individualists—has succeeded in maneuvers of amazing complexity, mobility. And all because each soldier can, if he must, become his own general.

Japanese Soldier Must Follow Plan

In a recent major battle in China, the Japanese command decided to disguise its advance troops. Each soldier was equipped with the blue shirt and trousers and the straw sandals of Chinese farmers; each soldier was ordered to make his way innocently along the road toward the objective, the railway city of Changsha. Yet no sooner did the false farmers appear than they were met by instant and intense Chinese crossfire from the two sides of the road. Their disguise had been almost immediately penetrated.

To be sure, the Japanese soldiers had done exactly what they had been told. They put on the clothes of Chinese coolies; they walked singly and in small groups. Yet they did not know how to act like anything except just what they were—Japanese soldiers in farmers' clothes.

The Chinese, on the other hand, have employed stratagems of disguise times without number.

The Chinese make their stratagems work. The Chinese soldier dressed as a farmer does not think of himself as a soldier in disguise: he is a farmer, he acts like a farmer, and he carries off his role with the aplomb of a distinguished actor.

But at Changsha, when the Japanese tried to ape Chinese tactics, the Japanese soldiers could only follow orders. They could do what they were told. But they could not imagine the way a Chinese farmer would act; they could not find the gestures and mannerisms to make complete their disguise. They were mowed down; and, although the Japanese offensive pushed to the very gates of Changsha, it was thrown back and decimated. The first major victory for the United Nations since Pearl Harbor started off with the failure of Japanese soldiers to do anything more than follow a plan.

He was a track star at Temple University . . . wooden-shafted golf clubs supposedly went out with prohibition and the crystal sets but you'll notice wooden-shafted putters in the bags of most big-time golf pros . . . Gene Sarazen explains it by saying the wooden putters have more "feel" than the steel-shafted variety . . . Buck Newsom says his contract with the Nats, with bonus clauses, will enable him to earn $20,000 this year . . . Newsom is now a country squire, owning the most fashionable home in Hartsville, S. Concert Singer Paul Robeson, former four-letter man at Rutgers, is among the best-advised Americans on the British-India political turmoil . . . Robeson is in frequent cable communication with his long-time friend, Jawajarlal Nehru, the East Indians' leader.

POVICH

Maj. Bud Sprague, listed officially as missing in action in the Java theater of war with his plane unaccounted for after a series of heroic feats, was the best football end in West Point history . . . he captained the Army team . . . ten years ago, Sprague had as his roommate at West Point for a week Westbrook Pegler, who was assigned to do a series of articles on cadet life . . . Academy officials emphasized to Pegler the complete equality with which all West Point cadets are treated before assigning him to share Sprague's quarters . . . on the second day he spent with Sprague, Pegler saw a first classman, Plebe, enter Sprague's room, salute stiffly, and hand Sprague a pair of new shoes . . . another salute, and the Plebe vanished . . . curious, Pegler inquired about it, and Sprague explained: "Oh, that fellow is a fourth-classman. I had a new pair of shoes that were hurting my feet, and I sent for him to break them in for me. He just brought them back."

When Jose Gomez, rookie Washington second baseman, was with the Chattanooga club, he had a 30-minute first fight with the team's catcher as the aftermath of a bum argument . . . in the presence of Club President Joe Engel, they fought three ten-minute rounds with a minute's rest before the catcher quit . . . with the acquisition of the Mexican Gomez, the Washington club roster now reads like a United Nations round table, embracing also two Cubans, one Czech and a Venezuelan . . . in 20 years of breeding, the United States Remount Service stallions have produced 181,200 foals . . . Army cavalrymen report that the Russian Cossack couriers use an interesting trick behind the German lines . . . when shot at by a lone enemy, they tumble from their mounts and lie motionless, face to the sky . . . as the enemy approaches cautiously to search his victim he almost invariably watches the arms for some sign of lingering life . . . as he bends over, the Cossack strikes upward with his foot, to which a deadly blade is attached.

Ring Magazine, whose selection of "The Fighter of the Year" is always eagerly awaited by the prize-fight industry, this month makes its most popular award . . . Gen. Douglas MacArthur is its choice as America's fighter of the year, and an inspiring picture of the general adorns the front cover . . . just before Claudio Villar, Spanish refugee heavyweight, knocked out Buddy Walker in the last half minute of the last round, Baltimore gamblers were offering 50 to 1 that Walker would win . . . one of 'em was clipped for $2500 on a $50 bet . . . Promoter Mike Jacobs is trying to match Villar and Billy Conn as a cofeature of the Lou Nova-Abe Simon match in Washington . . . just before the First Marine Division boxing team at New River, N. C., won the Carolina Golden Gloves tournament, their commanding general told them in an inspiring pre-fight pep talk: "Remember that you are in the Marine Corps and that when you crawl into that ring you are not just another athlete . . . rather, in the mind of every spectator you represent the Marine Corps, and the public will expect you, in so far as it can be accomplished with leather gloves, to live up to the fighting traditions of the U. S. Marines from BON HOMME RICHARD TO WAKE ISLAND."

Managers Joe McCarthy, of the Yankees, and Jimmy Dykes, of the White Sox, couldn't be bothered with making pennant race selections for the American League Publicity Office, although every other manager did . . . at Jacksonville, Fla., the other day after completing a six-inning pitching turn, Dutch Leonard hunted up Naval Lieut. George Earnshaw, who was in the stands, and got a half-hour demonstration of how Earnshaw used to throw his fast ball for the Athletics . . . American League hitters agree that Leonard would be unbeatable if he could mix his knuckle ball with a half-decent fast one . . . a Washington fan yesterday bet $1000 at 4 to 1 that the Nats would finish third.

On the Line

With CONSIDINE

New York, April 11.—If the weather is half-way decent, the Yankees and Dodgers might well draw some sort of an intersectional record crowd to the Yankee Stadium tomorrow for their final exhibition game. It will be the last game between these spiritual and geographical rivals until the opening of the 1942 World Series next October—St. Louis papers please copy.

CONSIDINE

The record exhibition game crowd isn't precisely in danger of being broken. The mark, curiously enough, was set in Germany in 1936. A kind of choose-up-sides game was staged one night during the Berlin Olympics, under feeble lights, and was witnessed by more than 100,000 spectators, most of them thoroughly bewildered.

But that crowd was phony to this extent: It was virtually ordered to attend. The only compulsion behind the attendance at the game tomorrow will be the inner-springs of Yankee fans who want to see the champs in action, and Brooklyn fans who steadfastly believe that the results of the late lamented 1941 World Series were a wicked snare and delusion.

Among the passes which Ford Frick presented to President Roosevelt Friday was a season's ticket for all of the Phils' home games. We don't know what Ford has against the Chief Executive, but our suggestion to the White House is to get rid of it immediately.

We were a little rough on Frick the other day, in a column kidding him about his no-umpire-baiting and no-humor-in-baseball-writing rules. In fact, we felt a little bad after reading it in print. But you never know . . .

"You punk," writes a Brooklyn fan named William Ketchel, as a result of the piece, "as far as I am concerned, Frick is spoiling baseball and I hope he is in Brooklyn some day, and you with him, when some of those Brooklyn fans start heaving confetti, and you and Frick get beaned. I guess you are on the payroll of the National League. Nuts to you."

And vice versa, ketch old boy.

Firts Baseman Johnny Sturm, Second Baseman Benny McCoy, Shortstop Cecil Travis, Third Baseman Cookie Lavagetto, Outfielders Hank Greenberg, Sam Chapman and Buddy Lewis, Pitcher Bob Feller, Catcher and Manager Mickey Cochrane, Pinch-hitter Don Padgett and Relief Pitchers Hugh Mulcahy, Mickey Harris and Earl Johnson.

When the big show opens Tuesday, there will be 64 big leaguers missing—42 from the American League where only one team, the White Sox, has not felt the breath of the draft.

"Tennis isn't doing a thing about the war effort," Pretty Mary Hardwick, the English girl, told us today with considerable vehemence. "Every other sport is coming through. Tennis should be ashamed of itself."

With Mary Round, who was blitzed out of Birmingham, England, with her baby son, Miss Hardwick will soon embark on a tour of exhibitions whose receipts, minus bare expenses, will go to war chests. Bill Tilden and Bobby Riggs have promised to go along with the girls, but there is an ominous silence from other top-notch players.

Foul Claim Disallowed In Feature

Jockey Mora Fined $200 After Objecting To Woolf's Conduct In Stretch Running

(Bowie Charts and Other Race Results on Page 4.)

By Walter Haight
A Staff Correspondent

Bowie, Md., April 11.—A claim of foul against W. L. Brann's Pictor was not allowed and the little son of Challenger II added the $5000 added Southern Maryland Handicap to his turf achievements before a crowd of 15,000 this afternoon. The 5-year-old, once believed to be the horse to succeed Challedon, drove into the wire three quarters of a length in advance of Phil Bieber's Maechance, with Gustave Ring's Cis Marion third and three lengths farther back.

The objection was made by Jockey Henri Mora, who had the mount on Maechance. The little Latin-American boy claimed that Pictor, handled by Georgie Woolf, came over on him approaching the finish and, from all appearances, he was right. Woolf struck Pictor with the whip and the Brann star began crowding Maechance. Mora stood up in his stirrups and did not ride for the final 25 yards.

Mora Is Fined $100

The stewards listened to the jockeys and they turned on the "official" sign. Then they dictated a ruling, slapping a fine of $100 on Mora for a "frivolous claim of faul," thus labeling the boy's stretch actions as an act.

This was the first victory of the year for Pictor, a son of Challenger II and Lady Legend. After running second in his first start at Hialeah, Pictor turned in three poor efforts. However, he appeared to have a wide class edge on his rivals today and was installed the favorite in a field that narrowed down to seven when Alaking and Challomine were scratched an hour before post time.

Pictor paid $4.70 and was clocked in 1:491/5 for the mile and a sixteenth over a muddy track. Pictor added $4200 to his earnings which now total $64,225.

Maechance Off Well

Mora got Maechance off alertly and was accompanied by Air Master as the field went into the clubhouse turn. Riding Light and Warlock were close up but Pictor dropped back steadily and the Brann representatvie was last going into the backstretch. Jockey Johnny Deering, on Air Master, made repeated efforts to get to the front but Maechance had something for his every bid. Pictor began to move up on the inside at the far turn and slipped through to get into second position behind Maechance when Air Master stopped.

Maechance was racing on the rail and Woolf took out with Pictor rather than try to get through. When the two rivals were abreast, inside the sixteenth pole Woolf struck Pictor, the horse swerved into Maechance and from that point to the wire Mora looked as if he did not have riding room. Cis Marion closed with a rush to take the show money.

Chicago Cubs Win, 3-1; Even City Series

By the Associated Press

Chicago, April 11.—Getting their edge runs on a passed ball and walk with the bases loaded in the seventh inning, the Cubs evened the spring city series with the White Sox in the first game played locally today. The score was 3 to 1 and deadlocked the series, started in California last month, at five wins apiece. The game was played at Wrigley Field. The final and deciding game will be played at Comiskey Park tomorrow.

For six innings the game was a pitchers' duel between the American Leaguers' Ted Lyons and Dunk Rigney and the home club's Bill Lee and Rookie Hi Bithorn, the White Sox nabbing a 1-0 lead when Bob Kennedy beat out a hit back of second, stole and scored on Mike Tresh's single in the fifth.

A Shy Young Fighter Decides You Can't Win 'Em All

1. Three-year-old David Maynard, a 40-pounder, appeared none to anxious for battle as he received final instructions for his bout in the twenty-third annual Junior Boxing Championships at the Naval Academy yesterday. Handing out words of wisdom is Gene Flatham, the Middies' 260-pound gridman

2. Perhaps David (left) knew what was coming. Here he runs afoul of a two-fisted attack by Tommy Berry as his trunks, not so well fitting to start, sag dangerously. To show what he thought of the whole boxing game, young David a few minutes later made a dash through the ropes and into the stands, leaving the ring and decision to his foe

20 Tots Wage Real Battles At Annapolis

By the Associated Press

Annapolis, April 11.—Grinning despite their battle "scars," 20 tiny boxing champs slept soundly tonight satisfied with jobs well done.

They capped many weeks of intensive training by romping to victories today in the U. S. Naval Academy's twenty-third annual junior sock sortie, trading blows with big punch pillows for two hours.

Slugging for the benefit of their mothers and fathers—and a host of movie and news cameras—the youngsters, between 3 and 13 and weighing from 30 to 119 pounds, gave a real Madison Square Garden performance.

One kayo marked the program, coming in the second melee when 3-year-old Phil Mandelkorn put Lester Belcher away on a technical knockout in the first round.

Best argument of the tournament resulted while Georgie Bass was outpointing Bob Cavanaugh for the 88-pound crown. All business and no foolishness, Georgie cleverly carved a clean-cut victory although Cavanaugh was rallying at the final bell.

Thirty-pounder Davey Maynard lost to Tommy Berry when he scampered through the ropes and into the stands.

Ruth Is Reported Winning Battle With Pneumonia

Hollywood, April 11.—Babe Ruth's physician reported today the one-time baseball idol's battle against pneumonia is continuing successfully.

"Ruth had a very comfortable night. His condition is improving," said the morning bulletin of Dr. R. Nichol Smith.

Navy Track Team Beats C.U., Villanova

Annapolis, April 11.—Villanova and Catholic University tracksters were no match for Navy's debuting cinder squad in a triangular meet in Thompson Stadium today.

Nats, Held to 4 Hits, Shutout by Phils, 8-0

Johnson and Blanton Pitch Shut-Out Ball as Mates Pound Wilson for 6 Runs in Sixth

By Shirley Povich
Post Staff Writer

The Nats returned to Griffith Stadium yesterday with a beautiful suntan. Otherwise they displayed little to be admired, and took a complete beating from the ordinarily inept Phillies, 8 to 0. The flush of the Nats' Florida triumphs in the Grapefruit League wore off in the chill of some four-hit pitching by Si Johnson and Cy Blanton, of the Phils.

Any doubt about who'd win was dispatched in the seventh inning when the Phils piled into big Jack Wilson for six big runs to improve what had been a 2-0 lead. A thousand overcoated soldiers who were guests of the management stuck it out bravely to the end, but most of the shivering cash customers departed the scene before the last inning.

It was no smashing debut the new Washington lineup made in their first Griffith Stadium appearance of the year. Check off two singles by Jake Early, one by George Case and another by Mickey Vernon, and that's all the Washington hits there were.

New Nats Unimpressive

The new members of the Washington lineup, Outfielders Stan Spence and Bruce Campbell, Shortstop Bob Repass and Third Baseman Bobby Estalella achieved nothing in the way of a safe hit. Repass, however, sent the fans' eyebrows arching with the fielding play of the ball game. He scrambled behind second base for a ground ball in the first inning, emerged from a contortionist twist and got his man with a throw that was on the beam.

The Phils' triumph ended a string of four straight losses to the Nats in exhibition games. The veterans Johnson and Blanton curve-balled the Nats into helplessness.

Wilson's pitching performance did not displease Manager Bucky Harris, however. The big right-hander was throwing a blazing fast ball and struck out six Phils in the seven innings he worked, walking only two. The two runs he allowed in the second inning spawned from a wind-blown triple by Ben Warren, and his troubles in the sixth inning were complicated when Bruce Campbell was forced to shy from a double by Warren into right field on account of a ladder left on the premises by sign-painters.

One of Wilson's two passes figured in the Phils' first run. After he walked Etten with one out in Hoyas Score, 10 to 3, Over American U.

It had to use a bitter, windy day to do it, but Georgetown University finally got its baseball season under way yesterday after several postponements. American University's nine fell a 10-3 victim to the hammering Hoyas, who spilled a total of 14 hits in various sections of the A. U. diamond.

While a tiny crowd cheered through chattering teeth, Joe Welles, former Wilson High southpaw, went the distance in impressive style for Georgetown. He gave the Eagles only five hits, three of them ground-rule doubles, struck out five and walked four batterz.

Welles' only rough innings were the third and fifth, when American registered three of its safeties. A single run scored on the first uprising and two on the second, despite the fact seven men reached base in the innings.

Errors Hurt

Meanwhile Hoya batters, still sporting early stiffness as the result of three postponements, played havoc with lanky Rube McNab's right-hand slants. The Eagles helped out with several sorts of bad fielding, however. Pairs of runs came home in the first, fifth and sixth frames, three in the third and one in the eighth.

That first Georgetown turn at bat was indicative of both team's efforts. Len Bonforte was credited with a single at the start, his fly to left being misplayed. He was out at second on Benny Bulvin's grounder. John Kulikowksi dropped another fly in front of Left Fielder Harry Newby, moving Bulvin to third, and after Hines had struck out Dick Dieckelman was walked, filling the bases.

At that point big Joe Georgydeak, the batting star of the day, punched out the first clean hit of the game, sending home two runs. It was the first of five straight singles for

Hershey Pro Battles Wind For Great 67

Nelson Retains Lead With Even Par 72; Byrd Slips to a 75, 4 Shots Off Pace

By the Associated Press

Augusta, Ga., April 11.—That tireless machine of golf—William Ben Hogan, of Hershey, Pa.—all but broke up the Augusta Masters' Tournament today and set its galleries buzzing like a barn-full of aggravated bees.

Tall Byron Nelson still was leading at the three quarter mark with 207 to Hogan's 210—but bettors who held wagers on the Toledo stylist were far more worried about his chances than they were yesterday when he led Sam Byrd, the one-time baseballer, by only a single stroke.

While Nelson shot a methodical 35-37—72 today and Byrd took 36-39—75, the Hershey prairie fire slicked five strokes off Nelson's advantage with a flat 34 on the front nine and a paralyzing 33 on the home stretch for 67 best round of the day.

Played the Wind

"It was the best managing I ever did," said Hogan coolly after returning to the club house. "I mean manipulating the ball, allowing for wind and roll. You had to do it in that wind."

He was over par only twice—on the par four 440-yard fifth hole when he took three putts, and again on the 425-yard fourteenth when he overshot the green and missed an 8-foot putt for a bogey five.

"It's simply unbelievable," exclaimed former U. S. Open Champion Lawson Little, who played in the twosome immediately following Hogan and early-leader Paul Runyan. "I don't know how you guys do it."

Hogan said he took 15 putts on the first nine and only 13 coming home—a total of 28.

Escapes Penalty

"I thought it must be something like that," commented Little. Hogan told admirers it wasn't as easy as it looked. The wind bothered him on the greens and on the ninth the wind actually swept his club against the ball and nearly cost him a stroke.

"I just can't seem to get the ball into the hole," Nelson complained, "unless it's three feet from the cup."

On the outgoing nine Nelson's play was perfect except for a bogey five on the first hole when he overshot the green. He made up the deficit on the next hole and was two-under-par at the turn. On the back nine his tee shot cropped on the lip of a trap behind the green and he chipped down four feet from the pin for a par-3. He bogeyed the 425-yard, par four 14th when his approach dropped behind the green but on the 16 he took a birdie deuce by holing out a 35-foot uphill putt. Three-putting from 50 feet on the last green cost him a bogey five and gave him an even 72 for the round—equal to par.

Byrd's two early rounds of 68 left him with slack for today's ballooning 75, and he was a stroke back of Hogan at 211 tonight at the three-quarters.

Paul Runyan, who shared the first-round lead with Horton Smith at 67 was fourth at 212 after shooting 72 today. Smith, badly bothered by the wind had to be satisfied with 74 and a third-round total of 214. Jimmy Demaret and Dutch Harrison

Winton Wins Point Race At Monkton

By the Associated Press

Monkton, Md., April 11.—A crowd of 4000 saw Stuart S. Janney, jr., on the favored Winton, win the thirty-fourth running of the My Lady's Manor Point-to-Point Steeplechase today, coming in 25 lengths ahead of John Strawbridge's Bangtown.

Winton became the favorite when the great jumper, Blockade, winner of three consecutive Maryland hunt cups, was scratched. There were six entries.

Last Appeal, ridden by Holmes Alexander, captured the twenty-first John Rush Streett Memorial Cup Race, after coming into the home stretch and taking the last tence neck-and-neck with Charge Account.

About 100 yards from the judges' stand, Charge Account buckled under John Merryman while Last Appeal landed safely after taking the final fence of the 3-mile chase.

The fall which lost the second race was one of two spills during the afternoon. Miltiades, with Pete Reid in the saddle, fell in the Memorial Cup race at the seventeenth fence while running second. Both remounted and finished the course.

John E. Hughes' highly regarded Field Glass, third in the 1941 Maryland Hunt, was third again in the My Lady's Manor race today, arriving five lengths behind Bangtown.

Janney last year rode Winton to victory in the John Rush Streett Memorial Point-to-Point over the estates of Leslie E. Kieffer and J. Myers Pearce near Monkton, and also won that day the My Lady's Point-to-Point on Vaunt.

Time of the second race was decidedly slower because of unfavorable running conditions.

No betting was allowed.

Major Leagues, Dimmed by War, Ready for a Gala Opening

Many Familiar Stars Missing This Season

Evidences of War Will Be Seen All About; Total of 64 Players Now in Armed Forces

By Judson Bailey
Associated Press Sports Writer

New York, April 11.—Sounding a familiar American note above the din of world-wide war, baseball's two major leagues will swing into action Tuesday in a new pennant serial they hope will be as enthralling as any of their previous peacetime adventures.

Both the fans and the players of the 16 clubs have had 6 or 8 weeks of buildup for the opening of the season and the getaway is expected to be made with customary fanfare.

The opening day program calls for:

AMERICAN LEAGUE

New York at Washington—Bonham (9-6) or Chandler (10-4) vs. Hudson (13-14).

Philadelphia at Boston—Marchildon (10-15) vs. Newsome (19-10) or Dobson (12-5).

Cleveland at Detroit—Bagby (9-15) vs. Benton (15-6).

St. Louis at Chicago—Auker (14-15) or Muncrief (13-9) vs. Rigney (13-13).

NATIONAL LEAGUE

Brooklyn at New York—Davis (12-7) vs. Hubbell (11-9) or McGee (2-10).

Boston at Philadelphia—Tobin (12-12) or Javery (10-11) vs. Blanton (6-13) or Johnson (5-12).

There will be plenty of evidences of the war. Familiar players like Hank Greenberg, Bob Feller, Hugh Mulcahy and Cecil Travis are among the 64 who entered the Army and Navy. Uniforms will carry "Hale America" insignia. War stamps will be sold by vendors in some parks and the New York Giants will require holders of passes to also buy war stamps for admission. Parks on the East Coast will have signs and sand and extinguishers in readiness for air raids. There will be more than twice as many night games as last year, a total of 158.

During the first World War most minor leagues collapsed and the majors curtailed their 1918 season under the press of a Governmental "work or fight" demand on all citizens.

Roosevelt Urges Baseball

But there is no present reason to believe that the current campaign will not be carried through in full. In January President Roosevelt wrote Commissioner Kenesaw M. Landis that it was his personal view that "it would be best for the country to keep baseball going" because people "ought to have a chance for recreation and for taking their minds off their work even more than before."

Under this impetus baseball is proceeding as nearly normal as possible and public interest seems to be almost as intense as in other years.

The world champion New York Yankees are overwhelming favorites to capture their sixth American League pennant in seven years and another tingling struggle is in prospect in the National League with the St. Louis Cardinals generally favored to oust the Brooklyn Dodgers from the championship they bagged last year.

Some observers (including this one, for the record) believe Brooklyn is capable of repeating and still others are counting on the Cincinnati Reds coming through.

All estimates, of course, are of less value this year than usual because key men of several clubs may be drafted during the season and the uncertainties of attendance in war time may influence the trading and selling of players.

AMERICAN LEAGUE

NEW YORK—The Yankees are as strong as last year and should slide along to the pennant at their usual calm but confident gait. There will be two changes in the lineup at the start, Gerry Priddy at third and either Rookie Ed Levy or Buddy Hassett, the veteran National Leaguer, at first, a position made vacant by Johnny Sturm's enlistment in the Army. The Yanks still have Joe DiMaggio, Joe Gordon, Charley Keller and company, with the veteran pitchers reinforced by some capable freshmen.

BOSTON—The Red Sox looked like a strong second-place club in the South with Rookie John Pesky at shortstop filling out a fine infield and Ted Williams leading a dangerous-hitting outfield combine. However, Pesky is Class 1-A and Catcher Frank Pytlak already is headed for the Navy. The pitching seems better than at this time last year.

CHICAGO—Fine pitching is the hallmark of the White Sox and should be good enough for third place, the same as last year, and might squeeze them into second. Wally Moses will be a new face in the outfield and may help Chicago's puny attack.

CLEVELAND—Lou Boudreau, 24-year-old shortstop-manager, has instilled a new spirit in the Indians and is shooting for the first division. Whether the Tribe makes it depends on how pitchers like Jim Bagby, old Mel Harder, Al Milnar and others make out trying to take up the slack of Bob Feller's enlistment in the Navy, and on Rookies Les Fleming at first and Oris Hockett in rightfield.

ST. LOUIS—The Browns have been tagged hard by the draft and are in a tight financial position that may force them to sell talent as they have done in the past. But Manager Luke Sewell has a good balance of pitching and hitting and his club will be troublesome. Rookie Vernon Stephens at short, replacing John Berardino, who has entered the service, is still a question mark.

DETROIT—The Tigers have been faltering ever since Hank Greenberg was drafted last season and now are in the process of widespread reorganization. There will be new faces at second base, shortstop and in two outfield positions this year. Buck Newsom, who pitched them to a pennant two years ago, has been sold to Washington. The club is riding a second division ticket.

WASHINGTON—Cecil Travis, the second leading hitter in the American League last year, and Buddy Lewis are among a dozen contributions the Nationals have sent to the war. Newcomers will be at second, short, third and in two outfield berths. The pitching is adequate and the club is angling for a third baseman. If he is obtained the Nats would be in the midst of the middle-class scrappers but they are picked for seventh now.

PHILADELPHIA—Old Connie Mack, who seems to have been building and rebuilding all his life, still is at it. Sam Chapman, Benny McCoy, Al Brancato, Rankin Johnson and others have gone into the service, leaving vast holes in the A's, who finished last even with these fellows last year. Their doom is obvious.

NATIONAL LEAGUE

BROOKLYN—The Dodgers are a well-balanced collection of veterans with Arky Vaughan, Augie Galan, John Risso, Larry French and Billy Sullivan—all old and time tested—added to the cast which copped the 1941 pennant. Vaughan, transferred to third from shortstop, where he starred for ten years with the Pirates, has added to the luster of the team immeasurably. However, Pete Reiser, last year's National League batting champion and the rookie sensation of the season, has been reclassified from 3-A to 1-A, and there is some doubt whether the pitching will be as effective as it was a year ago. If none of the parts wear out, the Dodgers can repeat. They know how.

ST. LOUIS—The Cardinals are mostly young and fast. Their pitching is as good or better than any other big league club and they can hit, even though they will miss the authority John Mize used to carry to the plate. Rookie Stan Musial will be in left field and another recruit, Ray Sanders, is likely to open at first base.

CINCINNATI—The stock in trade of the Reds still is pitching and they have plenty. They recently bought Gerald Walker to take care of left field and Ival Goodman looks like a new man in right. In addition, Rollie Hemsley figures to improve their catching. But no one knows whether Frank McCormick is out of the batting slump that wrecked his 1941.

PITTSBURGH—Manager Frank Frisch still is experimenting. Pete Coscarart, a weak-hitting second baseman for the Dodgers, will be at short. Jim Wasdell, a reserve for Brooklyn, will open in right, and Outfielder Bob Elliott will be at third.

CHICAGO—The Cubs shape up about the same as they finished last year, which was better than they started. They have fair pitching, real punch in Bill Nicholson and Babe Dahlgren, and the best third baseman in baseball in Stan Hack. But they are a jigsaw with several pieces missing.

NEW YORK—The Giants have done an extensive reconstruction job under the guidance of a new manager, Mel Ott. Since last year they have acquired Mize, Werber, Connie Ryan, Hank Leiber, Willard Marshall, Babe Barna, Tom Sunkel and others. Their pitching is inadequate and there is some question whether the veterans still can hit. If they can, the Giants have enough power to make a battle for first division.

BOSTON—The Braves have sent Bill Posedel and Carvell Rowell to the service and have added Catcher Ernie Lombardi and a rookie outfielder, Tommy Holmes. Their strength is about the same as last year when they landed in seventh.

PHILADELPHIA—New Manager Hans Lobert has given the Phils pep, but they don't have the ability to get out of the cellar.

Nats to Play Pofahl At Second in Opener

The latest development in the second base situation on the Washington Ball Club is an announcement by Manager Bucky Harris that Jimmy Pofahl will play the position in the opening game against the Yankees on Tuesday.

After strongly hinting that the veteran Ossie Bluege would be restored to the active list to take over the second base job in the absence of the ailing Frank Croucher, Harris late yesterday decided on Pofahl, his converted shortstop.

Harris did not share Owner Clark Griffith's elation at the arrival of his Mexican rookie second baseman, Jose Gomez. Griffith had predicted that Gomez would be in the Nats' opening-game lineup, but Manager Harris vetoed that idea.

Gomez was in uniform yesterday, but he was not in the Washington lineup because, Harris pointed out, the fellow had just stepped off a five-day train ride. He will play second against the Phils in an exhibition game today at Griffith Stadium, said Harris, "but Pofahl will play second at the start of the season."

The fielding of Gomez during pregame practice impressed Harris, but the Nats' manager expects little help from the Mexican in a hitting way. That makes it unanimous as far as all four of the Nats' second basemen are concerned as neither Croucher, Pofahl or Bluege have been noted for the manner in which they sting the ball.

Washington club officials were relieved by the club physician's report on Croucher yesterday, following X-ray examination. They had feared a chip bone in his sore throwing arm, but the photos showed only a possible torn ligament. "He'll be all right," said the club doctor, "it's only a matter of time."

Spence, center field.
Vernon, first base.
Campbell, right field.
Early, catcher.
Estalella, third base.
Repass, shortstop.
Pofahl, second base.
Hudson, pitcher.

Chandler and Bonham have been outstripping Red Ruffing, Lefty Gomez and Russo in the Yankees' exhibition games.

Griffith Stadium will house a sell-out crowd of 33,000 for the opening game, indications were yesterday. Reserved seats are still available, but by tomorrow night a sell-out is expected. President Roosevelt has not as yet indicated whether he would attend the opener, as is his custom, and one report is that secret service officials have been seeking to dissuade him from attending.

The Nats today make their final pre-season appearance, meeting the Phils before encountering an off-day tomorrow. Dutch Leonard will give his knuckle ball a seven-inning workout.

Texas League Opens Today; Tulsa Favored

By the Associated Press

Dallas, April 11.—The boisterous old Texas League, proving ground for some of the greatest on baseball's roll of honor, opens its fifty-fourth season tomorrow hoping to do what it never has done before—weather a war year.

And as the eight clubs rolled to the post, Tulsa was the leading choice of critics to draw up in top place but not without a strong contest from Shreveport.

Opening day games are: Tulsa at Dallas, Oklahoma City at Fort Worth, Shreveport at San Antonio and Houston at Beaumont.

The Texas League did not finish out the season during the Spanish-American War of 1898 and lasted three months during the First World War.

Three-I League Will Open May 3

Des Moines, Iowa, April 11 (AP).—The Three-I baseball League, the oldest Class B circuit, will open its 120-game schedule May 3 in the southern half of the organization.

Cedar Rapids, winner in the Shaughnessy playoffs last September, and Decatur, the runner-up, will start at Decatur, the 1942 schedules released tonight showed.

Wilson gave Johnson and Blanton a battle of it thereafter until the seventh when Etten led off with a single to center. Warren lined a ball into rightfield and Campbell dropped it in fear of stepping on a workman's ladder near the fence. Bragan and May followed with singles, Murtaugh walked and Waner drove in the third and fourth runs of the inning with a double to right. When Campbell misplayed the hop, a fifth run scored. Card Pitching Turns Back Browns, 7 to 2

By the Associated Press

St. Louis, April 11.—Getting the kind of brilliant pitching with which they expect to win the National League pennant, the St. Louis Cardinals defeated the American League Browns today, 7 to 2, in the opener of their annual two-game city series.

Southpaw Ernie White yielded only two harmless singles in the first five innings and Righthander Harry Gumbert followed with three no-hit frames before the Browns came through in the ninth to score on a double, a single and an error.

The Cardinals raked the Brown's pitching aces, Bob Muncrief and Elden Auker, for 11 hits and, what was most pleasing to the fans who are concerned over the team's offensive power, three hits each came from the bats of Martin Marion and Stan Musial.

Marion, graceful fielding shortstop, had a double and two singles and Musial, the rookie outfielder who starred in the last few games of 1941, hit a triple and two singles. Each batted three tallies across the plate.

Pete Reiser Denies Reclassification From 3-A to 1-A

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—Pete Reiser, 23-year-old centerfielder of the Brooklyn Dodgers and last year's National League batting champion, today denied that he had been reclassified from 3-A to 1-A in the draft.

Reiser said that the Brooklyn board with which he registered had sent him a notice before he went to the Dodgers' training camp inquiring about a house he was buying for his parents and had told him an effort was being made to reclassify as many men as possible into 1-A.

The baseball star, a bridegroom of two weeks, said he had heard nothing from his board since then and had no reason to believe there had been any change in his status.

Reiser said his parents, four sisters and a brother live in a home he is buying for them in St. Louis, and that his father has been in ill health.

Iowa City, Iowa, April 11 (AP).—A four-run uprising in the fifth inning gave Iowa's baseball team at 5-to-3 victory over Minnesota here today and a sweep of the two-game series.

It'll Be McDonald and Mike When Nats Open Up Tuesday

Poised to let the bells ring out, Arch McDonald, who combines sound effects with his own observations of the Nats' games, ready to begin his ninth season as an ace broadcaster of major league battles

Eighth Season at Microphone Sponsored By Lifebuoy and Wheaties, Abetted by Post

At 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, Arch McDonald will commence his annual baseball spiel as radio broadcaster of the Nats' home and road games.

The McDonald voice and wit returns this season to Station WJSV under the sponsorship of Lifebuoy Soap and Wheaties, which have bought the broadcasting privileges from the Washington club.

And again this season, McDonald will be teaming with The Washington Post, whose facilities of baseball coverage will be at his disposal. The Post will cooperate in the broadcast, providing McDonald with the play-by-play of all of the Washington club's road games where Shirley Povich, of The Post staff, will be in the press boxes.

With the exception of 1939, when Walter Johnson broadcast the Nats' games while McDonald was airing the games of the Yankees and Giants in New York, McDonald has been at the microphone in the Washington park since 1934.

Until his radio talents were discovered by Joe Engel, Chattanooga club owner, McDonald was a man of many careers. He had been a patent medicine salesman, Muscle Shoals worker, wheat field farmer, grocery salesman and an actor on the legitimate stage. While broadcasting baseball in the Southern League, he was voted the most popular radio figure in baseball in a Sporting News poll.

McDonald burst on the Washington broadcasting scene nine years ago, when he became the first radio announcer to put Washington games on the air. During his one year as official broadcaster for the games of the two New York clubs, he was baseball's highest paid radio figure.

Pirates Beat Athletics, 3-0; Lead Series

By the Associated Press

Wichita, Kans., April 11.—Outhitting the Philadelphia Athletics, 11 to 7, the Pittsburgh Pirates scored a 3-0 shutout in their next-to-last exhibition game today. The victory gave them a 6-3 edge over the A's.

With two out in the second inning, Pete Coscarart singled to score Frankie Gustine, then was forced home himself by three walks issued by McCrabb. Johnny Wyrostek, who bunted, scored the third run in the third inning on singles by Gustine and Eddie Stewart.

Stars in Their Heavens—All's Well With Nats

Bucky Harris' pitching worries are over.

Astrology, the science of the stars, will guide the Nats to victory.

So Harris was assured yesterday by a star-gazing Washington fan who inclosed a $10 bill to prove his good faith.

At Griffith Stadium yesterday Harris found awaiting him a long letter from the astrology disciple, who outlined Harris' pitching strategy as called for by the stars.

"Mr. Harris, here is a $10 bill. If you use my pitching selections and don't beat the Yankees on Tuesday, keep it," the writer postscripted.

"I am the man to help you produce a winning team," Harris read. "There is no use fooling yourself . . . there is something in astrology . . . if you give me $1 for each game you win on my selections, I will give you $10 for each game you lose . . . if you follow my instructions, I will never loose . . .

"If the opening game on Tuesday starts at 3 o'clock, pitch Wynn until 3:30, then put in Leonard and I will bet you 10 to 1 you win . . . I can show you by my astrology why Wynn should start and win for you . . . you have the best pitching staff in the American League, but a pitcher cannot perform up to standard if he is not started in the hour corresponding to his name.

"I would like so much to help you win and I know I can do it with my astrology, so won't you give my pitching selections a try. Start Wynn on Tuesday."

Harris indicated, however, that he would stick to pitching percentages and to hang with the time of day.

Hold Forth Captures Middleburg Feature by 15 Lengths

Second Place To Houseman In Feature

Sir Romeo Third; Mowgli Sets Pace But Falters; Victor Ridden by Leonard

By Anne Hagner

Middleburg, Va., April 11.—Surviving two rough trips over the same timber fence that sent him crashing earthward two years ago, Mrs. Frank M. Gould's Hold Forth today won the Louie Leith Cup at the Middleburg hunt races on the Glenwood Park course.

On both turns of the 4-mile timber route, Hold Forth rapped the big jump named in his honor after his fall, but he fenced brilliantly otherwise to win easily by 15 lengths over Christopher M. Greer, jr's. Houseman and Mrs. Amory Carhart's Sir Romeo.

By his victory, the veteran gelding became the second Gould entry to win the Middleburg feature, formerly known as the Middleburg Cup. Black Sweep turned the trick for the New York sportswoman in 1940.

Mrs. Crompton Smith's point-to-point sensation, Mowgli, went to the front early in the running and stayed on top for about 3 miles, setting a terrific pace. After he had opened up a 20-length advantage, backers of other horses were planning to tear up their tickets, only to see Mowgli fade as rapidly as he had bloomed. He wound up next to last in the 9-horse field.

Won Galloping

Jockey Leonard, coasting along easily aboard Hold Forth, saved his mount for the final mile, withstood Houseman's challenge, and won galloping. Time for the running was 8:14-2-5.

In the secondary feature, the Raymond Belmont Memorial national hunter steeplechase, T. Beatty Brown's Dunlad, representing the Piedmont Hunt, ran brilliantly under the smartest ride of the day to win over Thomas T. Mott's Port Law.

Both Port Law, ridden by Tom Mott, jr., and Gerald B. Webb, jr.'s, Big Charley experienced luck that is becoming traditionally bad. Big Charley, pace setter over most of the winding 4-mile course, looked as if he could keep on running all afternoon, only to tumble at the third fence from the finish line.

Port Law, who has spent the entire point-to-point season coming in second, repeated his 1941 performance at the same race by finishing in his usual spot, thus becoming the safest place bet of the year.

Ridden by Brown

Dunlad, former flat racer on the half-mile tracks, jumped well and responded easily to the careful ride given him by Owner Brown. When Big Charley fell just in front of him, Dunlad had to swerve twice to avoid hitting horse and rider. The winning combination also saved valuable ground on two occasions in cutting corners close to the flags when the rest of the field started to take the wrong course. The victory was by 20 lengths.

Fencers Stage Show at G.U. On April 21

Because it will be a novelty for Washington sports fans, the fencing festival to be held at Georgetown University on April 21 is expected to prove a popular attraction.

Georgetown's fencers, of course, will feature the program, though additional exhibitions and contests are listed between teams of numerous powerful foil teams in the vicinity.

Topping the local representation is Clarence H. Simmons, jr., a Guatemalan who is president of the G. U. Fencing Club. Simmons has studied his art under several distinguished Latin American and French masters, also under the famous Swedish champion, Gunnar Cedershiold. Other members of the local contingent are Ivan Hasslocher, Martin Garvey, Donald Kind, Henry Briefs and Bruce Morrison.

Walton Meeting Set Wednesday

The monthly meeting of the Bethesda-Chevy Chase Chapter of the Izaak Walton League is set for next Wednesday, April 15, at the National Capital Field Trials Clubhouse, at 8 o'clock.

As this is the opening day of the Maryland trout season, prizes will be awarded at the meeting for the heaviest trout, whether or not caught by a member. Prizes also are going for the heaviest individual trout in brook, rainbow and brown species, and there also will be something for the heaviest catfish and sucker, in case some trout anglers are unsuccessful.

Jolea Farms Show Today For Red Cross

Maryland and District-owned horses will meet their most severe test of the season today at the Jolea Farms Horse Show on the Travilah (Md.) estate of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph J. Cotter.

Many Virginia mounts are expected to be vanned to the show, which will be given for the benefit of the Montgomery County Red Cross Motor Corps, beginning at 9:30 a. m. and continuing throughout the day.

Site of the event may be reached by driving out River Road through Potomac, Md., to the Piney Meet House Road, where a right turn will bring prospective spectators to Gren Road. There turn left and go to Travilah, where another left-hand turn should be made. Jolea Farms is slightly over a mile away on the right side of the road.

Mr. and Mrs. Martin Vogel, jr., of Washington and Warrenton, Va., may bring their new 3-year-old, a handsome bay named Tradition, for his first outing of the season.

Finest exhibition of the current season promises to be the appearance of the Potomac Hunt's hounds, to be shown in the ring and then over the outside course by Huntsman Kane. Members of the hunt will follow over the fences at a hunting pace, making a true-to-life scene across rolling Montgomery Country pastures.

Classes are for junior horsemanship, junior hunters, green hunters, school teams, handicap jumpers, hunters under saddle, working hunters, family class, modified Olympia, ladies' hunters, open jumpers, pairs of hunters, knockdown-and-out, and two championships.

J. C. C. Handball Meet To Open Next Monday

The annual handball tournament of the Jewish Community Center has been scheduled to start next Monday, April 20, on the center's three new courts. Entries will close on Saturday.

Post . . and Rail

By Anne Hagner

If a horse show committee knew that, because of wartime restrictions, its exhibitors would come from the immediate environs of Washington, how should it arrange its prize list?

Miss Hagner

This is the questions that confronts the three local committees that are counting on their customary fall dates—Columbus, which is going to hold a horse show even if it has to be on a considerably reduced basis; the Washington Bridle Trails Association, which has dreams of giving the biggest event on the schedule, and Chevy Chase, which held such an excellent show last Sunday, in the face of numerous adversities, that its friends will insist that it carry on.

At both the University of Maryland and the Chevy Chase shows last week, this department divided its time between begging drinking water and besieging horse owners about what classes they prefer. And this, if you ask most of the local Rail Bird League, is what committees should emphasize:

Working hunter classes, without conformation and requiring only hunting soundness. Performances, manners and way of going should count.

Conformation outings reduced to a minimum, with one or two in which it counts only 25 per cent. Local folk use their mounts for hunting, hacking and showing, and they feel that they cannot compete with high-class thoroughbreds kept exclusively for showing.

Classes for horses under 16 hands; some exhibitors say that there should be a small, separate division for them, both hacking and over fences. That interest in smaller hunters has increased is proved by the appearance of 13 entries in the added class at Chevy Chase last week, in contrast to six entries at the fall show there in 1941.

Junior classes galore, for both ponies and horses. The world agrees that the young fry will be the ones to carry on the sport, and they never fail to turn out full force when there are enough classes to warrant it.

Bridle path hack classes so that riding academy horses may have a chance.

A smattering of events for owners up, even if they are restricted to hacking.

A strong set of open jumping classes, with difficult courses on the preferred list. Apparently most riders like winding routes and strange fences instead of the customary two on each side of the ring.

Enough hunter classes at 3½ feet to interest the young and novice riders. Such a restriction on height also appeals to some hunting ladies who do not mind jumping anything in sight while following hounds, but are bashful in the ring.

Rail Chips—Nick Saegmuller, field secretary of the Virginia Horsemen's Association at Warrenton, lists an imposing array of speakers for the meeting at Front Royal April 17 and 18 . . . Among them are Brig. Gen. Raymond Kelser, chief of the U. S. Army Veterinary Service; Col. E. M. Daniel, chief of Army Remount; Col. Paul H. Morris, commanding officer at Front Royal, and many others . . . Afterward will be a conducted tour of the Front Royal depot, including an inspection of yearlings and 2-year-olds, and a processing demonstration, showing the way that all animals are handled from the time of their arrival at the depot until they are ready to be issued for active duty . . . So many horses require transportation to the Jolea Farms Horse Show today at Travilah, Md., that Ray Norton, whose vans haul most local mounts, found himself with too many horses and not enough stalls . . . Gardner Hallman, with 15 show mounts at his North End stable, has decided to end the problem of how to water them at shows by carrying his own in a tremendous barrel . . . This also will be an advantage for finicky horses that refuse to drink strange water when they are away from home.

Busy Program Faces District Pinmen Today

The bowling front again presents activity for today with a number of interesting events on schedule in widely separated sections.

Of main import is the annual Husband and Wife event starting at 2:30 this afternoon at Arcadia. Always popular, the tournament is a five-game affair with total pins deciding the winners. No entry fee is charged, the participants merely paying for the ten games rolled by each twosome. Bert and Gladys Lynn are the defending champions. The winning duo is presented with a handsome trophy. A second shift goes on at 7 tonight.

The Nick Chaconas tournament is scheduled for 2 o'clock this afternoon at the Ice Palace, at which time the popular Chaconas will be presented with a trophy by the Try-Me Bottling Co. Scratch is 124 on a two-thirds basis and the entry fee is $3.50 for the five-game event. Jack Talbert, former Ice Palace manager, is donating his time in making the event a success. Additional shifts go on at two-hour intervals after 2 this afternoon.

Eddie Goldberg's mixed doubles event also is on the cards for this afternoon at Clarendon, but participation is limited to those bowlers who are members of leagues there. Entry fee is $1.60 per person and scratch is 228 with no limit to free pins. The three games may be rolled at any time.

The usual Sunday handicaps will be staged starting at 2 o'clock at both College Park and Hyattsville. These are three-game affairs with entry fee of $1.60. Scratch for both is 125. Due to their continuance over a period of many weeks the two tournaments have proven very popular with bowlers of both sexes. Howard Campbell, one of the newly appointed co-managers of the Ice Palace, also announces a special match for this afternoon between his match team and a strong aggregation from Baltimore. Spectators are invited.

Mason Chronister, Ex-Terp Runner, Was in Philippines

Mason Chronister, former University of Maryland miler, may be in the hands of the Japanese conquerors of Bataan Peninsula, it was learned yesterday. A second lieutenant in the United States Marines, Chronister is known to have been in the Philippines six weeks ago either on Bataan or in Fort Corregidor.

His mother, who lives at 1212 North Montford Street, Baltimore, told The Post last night that she had heard from her son about a week ago but that there was no postmark on the envelope.

"I don't know where he is at this time," she said.

Chronister left Shanghai just before the Japs took that settlement, escaping into the Philippines.

'Open' Tennis Proposed By Touring Feminine Aces

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—Open tennis competition for the duration, and the staging of all future tournaments and matches for the benefit of war relief, were advocated today by Mary Hardwick and Dorothy Round Little, high ranking British players, before they left on an exhibition tour for the British and American Ambulance Corps' Fund.

Miss Hardwick and Mrs. Little, who have been in this country since the 1939 Wightman Cup matches, started their tour in Hartford, Conn., tonight. Other exhibitions are scheduled for Chapel Hill, N. C., April 18; Norfolk, Va., April 23; Richmond, Va., April 24; Washington, June 6, and Chicago, June 27. Others, including Bill Tilden and Bobby Riggs, will take part in some of the matches.

"As soon as war broke out, English tennis went on a wartime basis, with all tournaments and matches being played for the Red Cross or some other war fund," said Miss Hardwick. "Amateurs and professionals alike played for the funds."

Both players suggested that expenses of all tournaments be limited to about 10 per cent and the remainder turned over to some war fund.

"Open tournaments certainly should be a part of this program," Miss Hardwick added, "because many of the better men are now in the armed services and the number of people available for first rate exhibitions and tournaments consequently is smaller."

Woodward's Apache Wins Experimental 'Cap at Jamaica

Colt Easily Turns Back Nine Others

Winner, in Fastest Time of Meeting, Defeats Incoming And Wait a Bit

By the Associated Press

Jamaica, N. Y., April 11.—William Woodward's Apache, one of the favorites for the Kentucky Derby, made a show of the Experimental Handicap at Jamaica today in his first 1942 start, winning by a length and a half.

Mrs. Sidney Zell's Incoming was second, a length and a half in front of William Zeigler, jr.'s Wait a Bit in the field of ten horses, six of whom were Derby eligibles. Of those in the money, both Apache and Wait a Bit are nominees for the May 2 Kentucky classic.

Apache caught the leaders as the field headed past the half mile mark and went past them as though they were standing still to win in 1:12⅘, fastest six furlongs of the meeting.

The rest of the Derby eligibles were strung out back of the leading three. The Jones boys' (C. S. and C. J.) Phar-Rong, champion juvenile of California last year, was fourth after fighting it out for the early pace for 4 furlongs. Mrs. Ed Mulrenan's First Fiddle was fifth; Mrs. Esther DuPont Weir's imported Hyacinthus was sixth and Mrs. Alice F. Sherman's American Wolf, a well-liked Florida campaigner and Derby eligible, finished tenth and last after breaking poorly and never getting into the battle.

The victory was worth $4150 to Apache, boosting his earnings for his two-season career to $19,225. Favorite in the betting, he returned $5.60 for each $2 win ticket

Swope Threatens Resignation Of Turf Post on War Issue

Chairman Wants Race Body to Contribute Now to War Relief

By the United Press

New York, April 11.—The various horse racing organizations better hurry up and decide on the part the sport will play in the war effort or they'll lose their chairman.

Herbert Bayard Swope, head of the New York State Racing Commission, who was named chairman of the turf committee of America at its recent Chicago meeting, today threatened to resign unless racing does something concrete toward contributing money to the various war relief organizations.

"And they had better get together in a hurry, or they'll have to get a new chairman," said Swope.

The committee, Swope explained, has made several suggestions to track owners, horse owners and breeders but various obstacles stand in the way of most of the plans. Stockholders of race tracks have to be consulted for one thing, said Swope.

Among plans suggested by the committee have been for each track to turn over receipts from its mutuel handle on certain "days;" donation of the entire "breakage" by each track; a split contribution by horse owners and racing associations with the former giving 2 per cent of his purse and the latter adding another 3 per cent and a plan whereby each breeder would contribute $10 for each live foal bred on his farm. Swope estimated the latter would yield close to $70,000 yearly.

"We're keeping at it, however," said Swope. "We want a plan that is equitable to all concerned. This turf committee represents the entire racing industry nationally, and the plan we're working on must be a national one. But I'm telling one and all now—I want something done, and I want it done quickly."

Other members of the committee are Maj. Louis Beard, of Lexington, Ky., representing the breeders; John C. Clark, of Florida and Harry Parr, 3d, of Maryland, representing the racing associations, and William Woodward, of New York, representing the Jockey Club.

The Swallow Wings Away With Race At Keeneland

By the Associated Press

Keeneland, Ky., April 11.—The Swallow, a spritely filly sporting the colors of John Hay "Jock" Whitney, served warning on other 3-year-old thoroughbred misses she will be a dangerous contender for divisional honors this year when she flashed to an impressive victory in today's featured Ashland Stakes, formerly the Ashland Oaks.

Despite chilling winds, a good crowd turned out to watch the daughter of imported Blenheim 2d, sire of Whirlaway, score decisively over Hal Price Headley's Spiral Pass and Milky Way Farm's My Choice. At the finish of the six-furlong spin, under perfect handling by Jockey Eddie Arcaro, The Swallow was two lengths in front of Spiral Pass. The latter was a half length in advance of My Choice. Four others trailed.

The winner, heavily backed, was odds-on favorite at $3.40 for $2. She stepped the distance over a heavy track in 1:17.

Former Johnstown Club Manager Dies

Buffalo, N. Y., April 11 (AP).—Norman McNeil, 49, a catcher on the Providence, R. I., International League baseball team in 1917 and a former manager of the Johnstown, Pa., team in the mid-Atlantic League, died today in Sisters Hospital. He also played for Petersborough, Ont., in the Old Canadian League.

Doubldrab Wins Inaugural Feature At Narragansett

By the Associated Press

Pawtucket, R. I., April 11.—Seeming to delight in the sloppy track, Mrs. Tilyou Christopher's Doublrab raced to a four-length victory today in the $5000 added Spring Handicap opening New England's racing season at Narragansett Park.

A crowd of 25,000 saw the four-year-old son of Sherab, the second longest horse in the field of six, pull away to an early lead and win handily to return on a $2 ticket in the mutuels $10.70, $5 and $4.10.

Doublrab, in gaining its first victory of the season, covered the six furlongs in slow time—1:12⅘—but the gray colt never was pressed.

The California entry of Samborombon and Grasshopper II were second and third in that order—two lengths separating them.

An extra race on the card ran for the benefit of the Navy Relief Society netted that organization $10,413.

Ken Overlin to Air Fights at Riverside

Ken Overlin, former world's middleweight champion, and Ray Carson, sports broadcaster, will air the boxing card Promoter Joe Turner is staging at Riverside Stadium April 20, over Station WWDC.

The fight broadcasts will be a regular feature of WWDC. Overlin formerly handled a sports program over the station but was unable to continue when his engagements as a fighter interfered.

Old Dominion Dog Club Holds Training Class

Novice members of the Old Dominion Kennel Club today will undergo a training class for persons expecting to enter their dogs in the club's big show April 25 at Alexandria, hoping to prepare themselves to handle their charges with perfect confidence.

Instructors will be on hand to help all who wish to learn. These will include Howard M. Grimm, president of the Old Dominion Club; Raymond and Lucille Scaggs, A. S. Gardiner, jr., and others who will coach owners of toys, hounds, working dogs, etc.

DeChard to Box Newark's O'Gatty At Riverside

Joe O'Gatty has been signed to fight Jimmy DeChard on Promoter Joe Turner's first fight card at Riverside Stadium, scheduled for either next Monday or Tuesday.

O'Gatty, 195-pound Newark heavyweight, is well-known in Eastern rings, having fought on a pair of Joe Louis cards. DeChard, Washington's top heavyweight, will be making his first start since injuring his side and hand against Jay D. Turner about four months ago.

Carl Guggino, crowd-pleasing lightweight, will also appear, and Turner is attempting to sign either Billy Banks, local colored fighter, or Billy Murray, sensational Ohio scrapper, as his opponent.

Gus Mirman and Bill Duffy will be matched with opponents to be announced later for the supporting card.

District A.A.U. Ring Champions Leave for Boston

Five local A. A. U. boxing champions and an alternate will leave this morning for Boston, where the national tournament begins tomorrow.

Lew Hanbury's inability to make the trip has allowed Pete Cilinski, a Golden Glove champion, to fill in the 126-pound assignment. Dick Mullin, bantamweight, and Lou Hayman, heavyweight, are unable to compete, and their places will go unoccupied.

Trainers Al Farrel and Lou Gavinson will accompany the local squad. The following boys are making the jaunt: John Corbin, 118; Pete Cilinski, 126; Tommy Larner, 135; Pete Latsios, 147; Charlie Maimone, 160, and Warren Doherty, 175.

Boys Club Will Hold Golden Jubilee Dinner

Conservation Head Urges Closed Season

By Jack Bell

Toronto, Ontario, April 11.—At this week's session of the seventh North American Wildlife Conference, Mrs. C. N. Edge, chairman of the emergency conservation committee, urged sportsmen to use their ammunition against Hitler and Japan instead of against the waterfowl.

JACK BELL

"How may this conference act to bring nearer that victory which the United Nations must win" asked Mrs. Edge.

"The first gesture we must make is to ask for a closed season on the waterfowl. I call it a gesture, for it would be a deprivation too slight to be called a sacrifice.

"I hesitate to remind you, now when we strive to put aside all selfish considerations, that a closed season would be for the benefit of the sport of wildfowling. But, I am a practical person, and I must set before you the fact that one year's closed season would benefit the birds and the sportsman far beyond five years of open seasons with shooting strictly controlled. In the past it has been argued that a closed season would deprive men of employment. Today our men are in the muntions factories, or facing eternity at the muzzle of Japanese guns. If we are at this time so deeply concerned to maintain employment for wardens and stewards of gun clubs, we may better preserve for the future the sport around which they may again build their lives when they return home.

"Our President has pledged to our Allies that the United States will supply munitions to the utmost that our factories and our men can produce. Duck shooting this year can benefit only our enemies. Every ounce of our ammunition must be hurled at our enemies in defense of decency and Christendom. Toronto, in wartime, is a strange place indeed in which to urge continued open seasons—and ammunition squandered in selfish play."

However, Dr. Ira N. Gabrielson, director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, in his address before the conference, stated: ". . . that all civilian activity is not going to stop despite a maximum war effort. People will still find it necessary to eat, sleep and to find relaxation from the strain of a war effort and a war economy. During World War No. 1 the out-of-doors furnished recreation for many, and there is evidence already that gardening, hiking and fishing—and doubtless hunting will join these in the fall—are replacing more expensive and less refreshing pastimes."

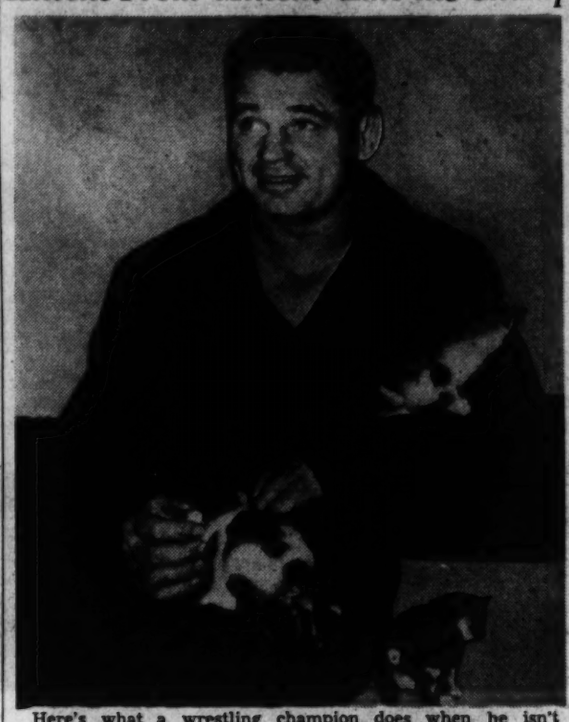
Here is a pledge that was proposed by Dr. Gabrielson at this conference and adopted:

"I pledge my heart and my right hand to my flag and my country.

"I further pledge myself to help carry out the wildlife conservation program, now in progress, to the end that your boy and my boy, now serving his country, may find the good hunting and fishing he has a right to expect, when he returns to civil life."

By the adoption of this pledge, we who wish to find recreation and relaxation by hunting or fishnig should, voluntarily, reduce our bag limits.

Kittens From 'Mittens' Like the Champ



Here's what a wrestling champion does when he isn't wrestling—playing with kittens. It's Sandor Sabzo, the National Wrestling Association titleholder, who defends his title Thursday night at Riverside Stadium against Cowboy Luttrall, of Texas, under Joe Turner's promotion. Lieut. Jack Dempsey will referee the bout. The four kittens are babes of Mittens, the Turner's Arena mascot, who was born under the Arena ring. The one on the champ's left arm has been named Sandy, after Sandor

D. C. Fight Fans Are Anxious To See Abrams-Mamakos Bout

With Heavyweights Abe Simon and Lou Nova officially signed for the main attraction of the Navy Relief Show May 21 at Griffith Stadium, many Washington fans have expressed a desire to see Georgie Abrams, of the Navy, fight Steve Mamakos, local middleweight.

Abrams, also a local product, recently lost to Tony Zale in a championship fight. In two fights against Mamakos, Abrams split even.

Mamakos was also defeated by Zale, but not until he gave the middleweight champion a whale of a battle. Mamakos, one of the most pleasing fighters in the game, is fresh from a layoff and has resumed training under Manager Matt Twomey.

There is a possibility that Claudio Villar, Spanish heavyweight, will appear on the Navy card. A tentative promise has been made provided he beats Red Burman in Baltimore April 27.

Campaign Chairman George A. Garrett of the local Navy Relief Committee has asked Promoter Mike Jacobs to accompany Simon and his manager, Jimmy Johnston, sometime this week for the signing of articles for the fight. Jacobs closed out for Nova through Manager Ray Carlen in Miami last week.

Maryland Bows to V. M. I. in Track, Wins Lacrosse Match

Virginians Easily Score, 77½-48½

Stickmen Turn Back Baltimore, 13 to 1; Sophomore Horn Sets Discus Mark

By Jack Munhall

University of Maryland launched its annual series of spring sports double-headers yesterday by dropping a track decision to Virginia Military Institute, 77½ to 48½, and then gaining an even break by overpowering Baltimore Athletic Club in lacrosse, 13-1, before several hundred Byrd Stadium fans. The day was raw and rainy.

It was the Terrapins' third straight one-sided lacrosse triumph and their first track setback in two starts. Last week they were held to an unusual 63-63 tie with V. P. I. V. M. I. was scoring its third consecutive dual meet triumph.

Heck Horn, giant Maryland sophomore, arose out of a sick bed to feature the track meet with a new university and Byrd Stadium record of 150 feet 7½ inches in the discus. The old mark of 135 feet 11 inches by Bill Guckeyson, Maryland's best fullback in modern history, was made in 1937.

Chewning Scores

Otherwise, the highlights were a "double" by V. M. I.'s Bill Chewning, who took the mile and two-mile runs, and an upset in the half-mile of Bob Condon, Maryland's Southern Conference indoor champion at the distance, by Mettiweather Jones, of V. M. I. Condon was coming back with scant rest after competing in the 440.

Chewning, a lanky youngster with a long stride a la John Woodruff, set all the pace in the mile as Sterling Kehoe, Maryland's promising distance runner, preferred to use his foe as a shield against the wind. Kehoe made his bid on the last of the four laps but as he tried to pull ahead of Chewning, the cadet unloosed a "kick" that left the Terrapin wallowing in his wake. Observers at first believed Chewning had started his drive too soon and that he would fold up. Contrarily, he was going away at the finish. The time was 4:33.

Kehoe again was Chewning's victim when he trailed the enduring visitor to the tape in the two miles after another interesting duel in which Sterling ran the fastest time of his career for the route, but still was beaten 10 yards. Chewning was clocked in 10:13.3.

Proves Surprise

The decisiveness of V. M. I.'s victory was a surprise to everyone, and especially to Assistant Coach Carney Laslie, who before the meet said his team had been fighting a Virginia forest fire in relays for the last five days and nights.

"Some of the boys have had hardly a workout since Monday. They've been fighting a forest fire on Brushy Hill. That's between Lexington and Roanoke."

Maryland blamed its defeat partly on its failure to take the events it had figured on winning, notably the pole vault, high jump and half mile. In the pole vault Carlos Englar, handicapped by a bad leg which he wouldn't test until the bar had gone above 11 feet, was beaten out by V. M. I.'s Leroy Roper who cleared 12 feet 1 inch. Roper failed in an attempt to lower the Byrd Stadium record of 12 feet 4 inches set last year.

Johnny Gilmore, Maryland's ace high jumper who once did 6 feet 4 inches for Tech High School of Washington, but now has trouble getting over 5:10, fell down to second in his specialty yesterday. The event was won by Harry Easterly, of V. M. I., with a jump of 5 feet 9½ inches. Easterly later annexed the broad jump with 32 feet 2 inches to complete a "double" and share the day's high point scoring honors with teammates Chewning and Walter "Slim" Galliford, who captured the 100 in 10.1, and the 220 in 21.8.

North Carolina Wins in Track Over Virginia

Special Dispatch to The Post

Chapel Hill, N. C., April 10.—Winning eight of the 14 events, and tying for first place in another, North Carolina's varsity trackmen easily defeated Virginia, 76½ to 49½, here today.

Leading the Tar Heels to victory were Warren Mengel, Roy Cathey, and Dick Van Wagoner. Mengel and Cathey were the meet's high scorers, with 10 points each, while Van Wagoner contributed nine points for runner-up honors.

Mengel won the 120-yard high hurdle event, tied for first in the high jump, and placed third in broad jump. Cathey copped top honors in the 220 and 440-yard races and Van Wagoner won the one-mile run and tied with Mike Wise, a team mate, for the No. 1 spot in the 880-yard run.

Stealing of Bases Proves Too Costly To Parks Service

At least one phase of baseball is being taken too literally by Washingtonians, the National Capital Parks Service has reason to complain.

Apparently thinking that base stealing is perfectly all right, whether done during a game or at night, unidentified persons carried off more than 100 of its bags last season, the N. C. P. S. claims. And it's got to stop.

According to G. W. Harding, chief of the N. C. P. S. maintenance division, the war has cut short the supply of big league bases on hand this year, and if these are stolen (except in the baseball sense) there will be no replacements. Harding also suggested that in order to save the bags as much as possible players cease prancing on them with their spikes and kicking them during play.

Petite Blonde Snags 249-Pound Marlin

Miami, Fla., April 11 (AP).—Geraldine F. Wells, a petite blonde from Detroit, does pretty well when it comes to catching blue marlin in the $10,000 Metropolitan Miami Fishing Tournament.

Winner of second prize last year, she entered a 249-pounder today. Miss Wells, who weighs about 110 pounds, battled the 9-foot 10-inch fish for 3 hours and 15 minutes before she landed it.

Mid-Atlantic PGA Members Open Season

Middle Atlantic P.G.A. members will open their competitive golfing season tomorrow at Kenwood Country Club with a three-partner pro-amateur tournament, to be followed by a meeting and drawing of the 1942 schedule at night.

Amateurs will be allowed half-handicaps in the pro-am play while the professionals will also compete in a sweepstakes. Site of the sectional P.G.A. championship, the national qualifying rounds, what the pros will do toward the war effort, and the working agreement with the Maryland State on pro-amateurs, will be among the problems tackled by the pros in the night meeting. Wiffy Cox, president, will preside.

College and schoolboy golfers will monopolize the competitive picture for the remainder of the week. Georgetown University's linksmen figure to recoup their losses in the south in matches with Catholic University Tuesday and George Washington Friday at Bannockburn.

The schoolboys have five matches each on Tuesday and Friday. Feature of the Tuesday matches will find Bethesda and St. Alban's meeting for the undisputed Metropolitan lead while Friday's headline clash will find Roosevelt and Central in the interhigh section at Kenwood. Bethesda and Blair meet the same day.

The Mid-Atlantic greenkeepers will make their golfing debut of the season at Rolling Road, in Catonsville. Golf at 1 o'clock will be followed by dinner at six and a general meeting at 7 p. m.

Southern California Trackmen Beat Bears

By the Associated Press

Berkley, Calif., April 11.—Performing true to form, University of Southern California's Trojans launched their 1942 bid for sectional and national track and field honors today by swamping the University of California, 81 2-3 to 49 1-3 in their annual dual meet before approximately 8000 fans.

The Trojans, who have cleaned up the country in this sport for so many years it has become monotonous, showed balanced power in brushing aside their old time rivals for the seventeenth consecutive season.

An injury helped them on their way to building up a convincing superiority, although it would not have affected the outcome had it not occurred.

California's Grover Klemmer, co-handler of the world's 440-yard dash and sole possessor of the world's 400 meter mark, pulled up lame just after the start of the quarter.

He dropped out of competition at about the 80-yard mark and Trojans' Cliff Bourland and Huble Kerns ran one-two in the event, timed in the new meet record time of 47.3 seconds.

Klemmer, who set the 400 meters record of 46 seconds flat last year and also tied the fastest quarter mile time of 46.4, had been instructed to drop out if an old injury in the achilles tendon gave him trouble. His coach, Brutus Hamilton, said later the boy was not seriously injured.

Double wins were scored by Leroy Weed, slender U. S. C. long distance star, in the mile and two mile runs; his teammate, Carl Merritt, who led the way in the shotput and discus, and California's Harold Davis, concededly fastest sprinter in the Nation. Davis raced the field into defeat in the 100 and 220 yard dashes.

Tournament Sites

Congressional Country Club will bear the brunt of the tournament play for this section's five major golf associations according to the schedules released thus far. Based on five days play for a tournament extending five days, such as the Middle Atlantic women's, and one-day's play for an 18-hole affair, such as a pro-amateur or women's cup event, Congressional has 17 days of tournament golf booked, despite the fact it is the second farthest club from the heart of the city.

WHITTLESEY

With both the Maryland State men's and women's championships going to Baltimore, the affairs extending more than one day for District courses are limited. Congressional has the Middle Atlantic women, District amateur and Maryland State women's medal play. Manor the Middle Atlantic amateur and Chevy Chase the five-day District women's. Biggest single-day events are the Maryland Open at Prince Georges and Hale America qualifying at Bannockburn.

With the Middle Atlantic P. G. A. yet to name its major tournament dates and several other miscellaneous affairs not settled, the number of days of tournament play at local clubs so far are:

Congressional	17	Washington	3
Kenwood	9	Bannockburn	3
Chevy Chase	8	Prince Georges	1
Manor	7	Indian Spring	1
Columbia	4	Argyle	1

Brick Wood Reports

What price putting? Al Edmonds, one of Washington Golf and Country Club's consistent 80-breaking members, played a nearly perfect round of golf last week, hitting 16 of the 18 greens in regulation figures, but the best he could do was a two-over par 72.

A little later Elmer Jenkins scrambled around 18 holes, reaching only five greens in perfect figures, and he finished up with a 73. It's that short game that counts.

Brick Wood, starter and first tee matchmaker at Washington, reports three newcomers who are applicants for membership, G. W. Benisch, K. G. Bingham and C. D. McDougal, have added to the near-score of middle 70 shooters at the Virginia course.

Wood, who makes the golf games for most of them, figures the club boasts more low-handicapped members who play even than any club in this section. After Claude Rippy, who is tops in town, the low-handicapped players are all about even bets, and Wood is getting to the point where he is cagey before giving them any ups. Pro Dave Thomson spots most of them 1 up or so but they are ganging up on the pro force.

In addition to the newcomers and Edmonds and Jenkins, there are Johnny Holzberg, Pete Pardoe, Les Whitten, Ralph Fowler, R. T. Harrell, Alex Alexander, Turner Smith, the former Belle Haven champion; Joe Kirchner, Arthur Dezendorf, Frank Wililams, Don Lee and W. R. McLister. Sid Carroll, business manager of the Redskins, is just a shot or two away and, with a little more golf under his belt, will be a club championship threat with the best. Washington, if all the above could get together any one day, would have a strong claim to any local team championship.

Divot Data

Gene Sarazen, who demands publicity and when his game gets a little stale faithfully comes up with a blast at some phase of the golf game, hit a new low last week when he chided Sam Snead for playing bare-footed during a Masters practice round, as a publicity stunt. The game could stand a little constructive criticism now instead of bad advertisement . . . A majority of the clubs are frowning on allowing inductees to play free of charge, as Congressional and Indian Spring have done. They all have pretty good reasons . . . Congressional members have already paid off more than $200 in minor golfing wagers in defense bonds and stamps, with Dr. R. A. Keilty behind the plan . . . This section needs some action on golf's part in war work, such as raising money, prizes in defense bonds, and facilities for soldiers, instead of talk . . . In the opening round of the scholastic golf league matches, 16 boys won by margins of 8 and 7 or worse, mostly in the lower brackets.

Private Eddie Stevens, the inductee who was assistant pro at Manor, writes from the Huntsville, Ala., Arsenal that he was one of 20 selected from the camp to march in an Army Day parade . . . W. L. Jones, president of Manor Country Club, thanked all the members by letter for the gratifying treasurer's report which left 1941 in the good old black . . . With their various means of income lessened daily, the pros naturally must keep down expenses. Eight of them were saved from slicing their higher-priced assistants, however, by the boys leaving for the army or better jobs . . . In a reply to a letter from this department as to golf's part in the war, Stephen Early, secretary to the President, mailed a copy of President Roosevelt's general statement of March 10 . . . The stop order on golf club manufacture was expected by all the clubs and did not leave them flatfooted . . . Wiffy Cox's shop, for instance, a club buyer's paradise.

Georgydeak Caught

Though it allowed Georgetown three more runs in the third, clinching the decision, American came up with the fielding gem of the game then. Two runs had crossed the plate when Charley Costello, Hoya catcher, slammed a blistering drive to Centerfielder Dick Zarbock. It was played perfectly, caught on the run and pegged like a bullet to first base to catch Georgydeak off.

What little enjoyment Eagle rooters got out of the game resulted from the play of McNab and Bob Lanzillotti, second baseman. McNab, fresh up from the high school ranks at Washington-Lee at Arlington, managed for seven strikeouts while his mates were kicking the team's chances around. He also contributed a double to the offensive cause and handled four fielding chances without a misplay.

Lanzillotti, Hits Twice

Lanzillotti, a converted outfielder, rang up two of the losers' hits, both singles, and also turned in two sparkling plays at second. In the seventh he went into rightfield to make an over-the-head catch, of Bill Hassett's fly and in the final inning he came up with a torrid grounder off Bonforte's bat to make possible the third out.

His only error, comprising the oddest play of the game, came in the sixth when, with men on first and third, he was caught flat-footed by Catcher Shepherd's toss as Bulvan attempted to steal. The ball went nito the outfield, scoring a run.

Penn's 5-Run Rally Beats Middies, 11-8

By the Associated Press

Annapolis, Md., April 11.—A five-run ninth-inning rally, climaxed by Art McQuillen's three-run homer, enabled Pennsylvania's Quakers to snap Navy's three-game baseball winning streak, 11 to 8, today.

Penn's big splurge wiped out Navy's three eighth-round runs which had sent the Tars in front, 8 to 6. The game was marred by four Navy errors, 17 walks, 11 issued by three Quaker hurlers, and three hit batsmen.

McQuillen's four-master drove Phil Hurt, veteran Middie flinger, to the showers and robbed him of his second victory of the season.

Chicagoan Repeats Ace on Same Hole On Successive Days

By the Associated Press

French Lick, Ind., April 11.—Fred B. Snite, of Chicago, fired a hole-in-one today while playing in the second round of the Midwest Amateur Golf Tournament—his second ace in successive days on the same hole.

Both hole-in-ones were made on the 142-yard sixteenth hole of the French Lick Springs Hotel hill course.

On both occasions Snite used a No. 3 iron and the shots hit on the front part of the green and trickled into the cup. The feat was attested by five witnesses—three golfers and two caddies.

Buying Power In D. C. Again Leads Nation

Of the country's "richest" cities, those with the greatest effective buying power per capita, Washington topped the 1941 list with $1485. for each person.

The estimate was made by the magazine Sales Management, widely accepted by executives for its annual total and detailed regional sales figures which precede by several months the official Government figures.

The survey also gave the first estimate for 1941 of the actual number of retail dollars which flowed into merchants' coffers in the leading cities.

The first ten in retail volume, with the estimated cash-register readings, were:

New York City, $3,694,440,000; Chicago, $1,934,852,000; Philadelphia, $1,088,724,000; Detroit, $986,940,000; Los Angeles, $920,899,000; Boston, $632,511,000; Washington, $600,000,000; Cleveland, $568,207,000; Baltimore, $560,317,000; Pittsburgh, $479,036,000.

Following Washington, with average buying power per capita ranging from $1,386 to $1,255, were Hartford, Conn.; Long Beach, Calif.; Pasadena, Calif.; New Haven, Conn.; Atlantic City, N. J.; San Francisco; Bridgeport, Conn.; Waterbury, Conn., and Seattle.

The effective buying income of the Nation, which the survey defined as all the income produced less certain nonspendable portions, such as surpluses retained in corporation reserves, and social security payments by companies and individuals, was $91,120,000,000 last year, nearly $17,000,000,000 more than in 1940, and about $10,000,000,000 above the 1929 boom year.

The average family expenditures in retail outlets ran to $1,562 last year compared with $1,317 the previous year.

British Wage Earner Pays 50% Income Tax

Surtaxes in Highest Brackets Commandeer $19.50 of Every $20; New Budget Awaited

By William J. Humphreys
Associated Press Correspondent

London, April 11.—Everyday Britons, whose government has spent $39,700,000,000 since September 3, 1939, on the eve of another war budget today felt that the exchequer just couldn't squeeze a substantial tax increase out of their already frugal standard of living.

The present basic income tax rate leaves the working man 50 cents out of every dollar he earns.

In the highest income brackets surtaxes commandeer $19.50 of every $20.

This close approach to what a cheerfully-paying public feels is the "saturation point" is equalized over the breadth of the social classes and has resulted in a minimum of speculation over the budget Sir Kingsley Wood soon will announce to the House of Commons.

Further Rise Feared

It is true that there is some apprehension in the "city"—London's financial district, comparable to America's "Wall Street"—that the exchequer will lift income and surtax rates. But the little people are sure there can be no heroic plan to balance the budget.

That's just about impossible in this, the most expensive of all wars.

Britain's small wage-earner knows that whatever additional burden he is called upon to shoulder cannot be much. What cheers him most, in a misery-loves-company way, is that in any event all will stagger along under proportionate tax loads.

For Americans whose new income tax rates have brought home compellingly the high cost of modern war, the picture of the less fortunate United Kingdom taxpayer may be of some comfort.

It may also suggest two stern lessons for the future if the war drags on.

Two Lessons Cited

Those lessons, said Geoffrey Crowther, editor of the Economist, are:

"1. Don't underestimate the extent to which expenditures will rise;

"2. Don't underestimate the people's willingness to pay."

In general, the $39,700,000,000 Britain has spent since the war began was raised as follows (000 omitted):

Revenue (taxation)	$17,092,000 or 43%
Loans	14,040,000 or 35%
Floating debt (short term loans from banks, etc.)	8,596,000 or 22%

"Unfortunately," Crowther explained, "it isn't possible to say that all loans have been purchased out of savings. Banks have taken some and some have been bought in exchange for other capital assets (such as American securities) surrendered to the government.

"A white paper to be issued with the budget next week should make it possible to break down the total into: (1) taxes, (2) other compulsory contributions such as social security payments and war damage premiums, (3) savings, (4) drafts on capital and (5) credit expansion.

War Loans "On Tap"

"How has this all been done? On taxes the story is obvious. On loans, the national savings campaign has been the answer.

"The policy has been pursued for most of the war of having war loans 'on tap,' that is, continuously convertible into cash, and of not making specific issues of fixed amounts from time to time.

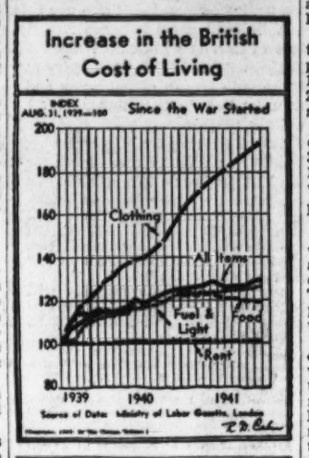
"Banks play their share, too. In addition to the familiar method of offering Treasury bills to them, the banks have been asked to deposit specified sums week by week with the Treasury.

"Except on matters of detail there have been no major criticisms of this system. On the contrary, two aspects have given great satisfaction.

"One is the high proportion raised in taxes—considerably higher than in the last war. The other is the low rate of interest—nothing has been borrowed at more than 3 per cent, and the average rate is just under 2 per cent.

"Moreover, interest paid out is subject to the full rate of income taxes and surtaxes, so that the net cost to the Government is well under 1 per cent.

"That is considerably different from the last war."



Time Limit Extended On Tea Inventories

By the Associated Press

The War Production Board yesterday extended until April 25, the date on which receivers or packers must file reports of tea inventories of 500 pounds or more. The board originally had ordered the reports filed by April 6, but additional time was required for distribution of the necessary forms.

Stocks Close Week at New 4-Year Lows

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—The Stock Market finished a declining week still on the downside today with bearish war news generally taking the principal blame.

Slipping tendencies were the rule at the opening and while losses on the whole were limited to fractions, average prices closed at the lowest levels in four years.

The redeeming feature was that there never was any real selling pressure in evidence. Transfers of 142,560 shares compared with 176,210 last Saturday and were the smallest since March 28.

The Associated Press composite of 60 stocks was off .1 of a point at 34.1, a new bottom since March 31, 1938. On the week this barometer was down .5.

Bearish War Picture

Chilling sentiment, brokers said, was persistent gloom over Bataan and apprehension anent the breakdown of British-Indian negotiations. The cloudy domestic picture also provided scant speculative or investment stimulation.

Belief the market was oversold, even considering pessimistic developments at home and abroad, touched off the one and only real rally of the week on Monday. The list lost ground Tuesday and Wednesday and, on Thursday, suffered the sharpest break since March 11 as dispatches told of the Japanese sweep in the Philippines and the sinking of two British cruisers in the Bay of Bengal. Quotations steadied Friday on the idea another technical rebound was due.

Questions regarding broadening taxes, earnings, dividends, profits limitations, Federal controls and a new administrative move to curb inflation helped keep potential purchasers in the rear ranks.

Pivotal Issues Weak

Prominent on the day's retreat were U. S. Steel, Bethlehem, Chrysler, General Motors, Santa Fe, American Telephone, Kennecott, Douglas Aircraft, Du Pont, Union Carbide, J. C. Penney, U. S. Gypsum, Western Union and Texas Co.

American Tobacco "B" was off ⅜ of a point in the wake of the company's announcement of a 100 million dollar financing program. Liggett and Myers "B" conceded 1½.

Ending a shade ahead were Pennsylvania, Chesapeake & Ohio, Northern Pacific, Anaconda, Public Service of N. J., U. S. Rubber, Goodyear, General Electric and Sears Roebuck.

Some rail bonds improved. Commodities were uneven. At Chicago wheat was up ⅝ to 1 cent a bushel, corn unchanged to off ⅜ and hogs about steady. Cotton dropped 85 cents to $1.05 a bale.

Aluminum Ltd. advanced 3 points in the curb and minor gains were recorded for American Cyanamid and Pantepec. In the minus column were Humble Oil, Creole Petroleum and Niles-Bement-Pond. Turnover here approximated 23,000 shares versus 44,000 a week ago.

Broad Ration Of Goods Now Near at Hand

By the Associated Press

New York, April 11.—Rationing of many kinds of everyday goods moved closer this week.

The War Production Board announced freezing of all stocks of copper screening in retailers' hands.

Copper screening thus joins new automobiles, new and retreaded or recapped tires, typewriters and bicycles as items that cannot be sold except to specific buyers with essential civilian or war jobs.

Local rationing boards are handling distribution of automobiles and tires.

Government officials say these local boards shortly will be given instructions for rationing typewriters and bicycles.

Soon they will be handling the rationing of sugar.

It may be presumed copper screening will be sold to essential users through local boards, too, provided the Government does not take all existing stocks for military uses.

Boomerang Policy

Meanwhile the Nation's store and shopkeepers who laid in heavy supplies of counter goods began wondering about the wisdom of the "buying ahead" policies.

Anticipating higher prices, smaller available supplies and delivery difficulties as peacetime plants converted to war production, stores as long as two years ago began precautionary stocking.

Stocks of most kinds of goods in retailers' hands today are believed to be at or near the highest on record.

"Retailers, now scrambling to buy up everything possible against the day when many consumers' goods will become scarce, may find that protective inventories will become a liability," remarks Standard & Poor's, a statistical agency. "Rationing will make them wish that they had been more restrained in their efforts to load up their warehouses.

Capital Tied Up

"Consider the plight of the auto tire dealers, most of whom stocked up before the ban on tire sales," the agency adds. "When rationing was ordered they found themselves with capital tied up in inventories that would require years to move under the rationing plan adopted. The Government has been forced to bail them out.

"Automobile dealers are now in the same spot and would like nothing better than to be rid of their inventories of new automobiles. But Washington is very reluctant to take over these cars and no immediate relief for the dealers is in sight."

U. S. to Compel Sales of Kapok

By the Associated Press

Asserting that an unidentified East Coast warehouse was an "unsafe place of storage" for kapok, the War Production Board yesterday ordered 28 owners storing in the building to sell their holdings to the Government immediately.

Unless the stocks were sold to the Defense Supplies Corporation in compliance with the order, WPB said they would be requisitioned.

Kapok, a highly buoyant fiber obtainable chiefly from Java and Sumatra, is in heavy demand for life preservers and other life-saving equipment. It is highly inflammable, and WPB said that, in the particular warehouse involved, there was danger both from fire and sabotage.

Tanks, Planes, Guns Roll Ahead of Schedule As Former Auto Industry Shelves Competition

Detroit, April 11.—Tools and trade secrets that once enabled individual automobile companies to outproduce competing firms have been made common property throughout the erstwhile car industry.

There are no written agreements about swapping tools and manufacturing practices, but the exchanges have been going on for months.

The results are being shown in the production of guns, tanks, aircraft engines, bomber plane subassemblies, shells and scores of other things which the industry a few years ago scarcely expected to see rolling out of plants that once built passenger cars and trucks.

All along the line the industry is ahead of schedule; in many instances it is months ahead of originally fixed delivery dates on a certain volume of antiaircraft cannon, bomber plane parts and the giant power plants that go into them, and the medium Army tanks. The tanks are being shipped in "trainload" lots; the guns, plane parts and engines in "carloads."

What these terms mean in unit numbers is a military secret. It can be said, however, that where two "trainloads" or two "carloads" originally were scheduled for shipment in a given period, three now are leaving the factories.

Perhaps the schedules did not contemplate the unrestricted exchange of tools and engineering ideas. Perhaps for this reason the schedules purposely were drafted with extreme conservatism, or perhaps the industry followed a usual custom and fixed delivery dates far enough ahead so that beating them was a foregone development.

Whatever the controlling factor, the industry has bettered the schedules by considerably wider margin than any of its engineers thought possible.

Of course, there were many rejections when the first war weapon parts and the assembled units came off the production lines, but the production "bugs" are being eliminated rapidly, just as they were with pilot models of new automobiles that used to roll off the lines in August and September.

Particularly interesting in the industry's war conversion effort is the fact that it is progressing even more rapidly than the switch-over from one model to another in normal times. This is demonstrated by the ever-growing stream of men—and women—moving into the factories after the layoffs necessitated by the cessation of all passenger car production.

The latest figures used by labor representatives in estimating current unemployment placed the total at 170,000. That was nearly a fortnight ago, and statistics of the State unemployment compensation commission more recently showed a further decline from the original 225,000 to 230,000 affected by the stoppage of all normal activities in the assembly plants.

The one-time automobile industry normally employes approximately 550,000 hourly rated workers. With the women new to the industry who have taken jobs in the war implement factories, there probably already are close to 450,000 persons at work in the former car factories alone.

It seems a safe guess that if the former motor car industry spreads its employment rosters to the predicted one million by the end of this year, close to a quarter of a million of them will be women.

Hog Price Upsurge Claims Spotlight

By the Associated Press

Hogs again claimed the spotlight in the major commodities markets yesterday while wheat gained and cotton drooped.

Cotton futures prices closed 85 cents to $1.05 a bale lower as buyers hesitated and longs liquidated freely.

Livestock held about steady after a week of rising tendencies.

Hogs again established a new 16-year peak. Few hogs were placed on the market, offering no test of values. Top was quotable at $14.50, the same as yesterday, when the average price was $14.37 against $13.87 a week ago and $8.66 a year ago.

Wheat was ⅝ of a cent higher, corn ¼ to ½ lower.

The Associated Press weighted index of 35 commodities in wholesale cash markets was unchanged from yesterday when it reached a new high of 99.27 per cent of the 1926 average.

WPB Relaxes Rules As Scrap Paper Piles Up

By the Associated Press

Removal of restrictions on the size of waste paper stocks held by paper mills is expected to break the jam resulting from record-breaking waste paper collections throughout the country, WPB said yesterday.

Commenting on reports from various sections that junk yards were piled high with waste paper which mills were unable to absorb, WPB's bureau of industrial conservation predicted the tie-up would end soon.

Since last fall, a spokesman explained, the Government has limited the size of paper mill inventories to assure equitable distribution of supplies. The restriction was imposed at a time when the paper shortage was worst with many mills closed down.

Since then, the salvage campaign has brought a rapidly increasing flow of paper, with junk dealers receiving it more rapidly than the mills could take it off their hands. Last Monday to adjust the situation, WPB lifted all restrictions on inventories permitting mills to build up stocks to capacity limits.

Endorsements Allowed In Lieu of New Policies

Lansing, Mich., April 11 (AP).—For paper conservation, the State insurance department today authorized fire insurance companies to renew policies by an indorsement and without issuance of a new policy.

Commissioner Eugene P. Berry, making application optional with the companies, suggested the indorsement be constituted in a slip of paper signed by company and agent containing a statement of premium paid for extended coverage.

Westinghouse Bows to Edict On Light Bulbs

By the Associated Press

Trenton, N. J., April 11.—The Government filed in Federal Court today a consent decree under which the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. accepted wide restraints sought by the Department of Justice against 12 major light bulb manufacturers.

The firms were named defendants in an antitrust suit scheduled to open Monday in Federal Court here.

Westinghouse agreed to restraint from enforcing restrictions on price, territorial or quota conditions placed on any patent licenses granted by the company.

Also forbidden were new agreements or contracts with any lamp manufacturing firms by which territorial or quota restrictions would be placed on the makers' use or sale of bulbs.

Westinghouse was ordered under the consent degree signed by District Judge Phillip Forman to issue royalty-free licenses to any persons applying under all patents relating to lamps held by Westinghouse without any restrictions as to products to be manufactured or price to be charged.

Westinghouse further agreed to accept restraint against using the trade mark "Mazda" providing General Electric were also barred from its use in the forthcoming trial.

The decree was filed after a conference by company counsel with representatives of the antitrust division of the Department of Justice.

The Federal Power Commission announced yesterday the Eastern Shore Public Service Co. of Maryland, the Delmarva Power Co. and Eastern Shore Public Service Co. (Delaware) had asked authorization for the Maryland company to acquire the assets of the Delmarva company.

The Maryland company proposes, the commission said, to issue $1,750,000 in aggregate principal amount of its first mortgage bonds, 4 per cent series, due 1969, and 4500 shares of common stock for delivery to Eastern Shore of Delaware, in exchange for all Delmarva's outstanding bonds and stocks now held by Eastern Shore of Delaware.

Delmarva's assets, the application set forth, consisted among other things of a 19,500 kilowatt steam generating station located at Vienna, Md.

Renegotiated Order Saves 40 Millions

By the Associated Press.

Detroit, April 11.—C. J. Reese, president of Continental Motors Corporation, which recently renegotiated its contract prices for aircraft type engines being made for the Government, said today that the reduction of 40 million dollars in the total value of the contracts was made possible by tremendous increases in production levels.

These were levels, he said, "far greater than was thought possible when our early contracts were negotiated," and were reached "months ahead of our schedule."

"Because we met with War Production Board and Army officers on March 28 we knew that the Government wanted our production doubled, which obviously meant even greater manufacturing efficiency than we had previously been able to attain. We were told by Government representatives on that day that Continental was to be used as a sort of guinea pig in a program of contract price renegotiation that was to embrace a large list of corporations that, like Continental, have been able to secure greater manufacturing economies based on volume production than had been believed possible before Pearl Harbor.

"Further, we were told that the reason Continental was first on the list was not because its prices were more out of line than those of other manufacturers, but because the cooperativeness of our management in the past and our outstandingly successful labor relations made improbable any unfavorable repercussions against the company."

Reese said that aside from reduction in corporate profit earnings, income and excess profits taxes this year "are expected to recapture for the Government approximately 75 cents of each dollar earned."

"Censorship regulations," he went on, "forbid naming the total value of Continetnal contracts against which this 40 million dollar reduction applied, but the sum is so tremendous that if it could be stated, the 40 million dollars would not appear nearly as large as it does standing alone.

"The fact is important, too, that 40 million dollars will not be saved for the taxpayers as a result of our revised prices. The real saving probably will be approximately ten million dollars because, were Continental to earn 40 million dollars additional, even present income and excess profits rates would require that 30 million dollars of it be paid back in that way."

Listen! with Glynn

When Arthur Godfrey, in Washington, D. C., starts insisting that "Victory Begins At Home" on his program of that name over WJSV and the Columbia network, it isn't just words. He knows what he's talking about, and proves it on every broadcast from authentic Government material.

In fact, Godfrey has a former United Press man, Paul Green, whose main job it is to go from Government office to Government office gathering up the dry, basic facts which Godfrey puts to his listeners in interesting, down-to-earth form.

Godfrey has fifteen minutes a day, three days a week — Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, from 11 to 11:15 a. m.—to prove, with facts, that victory begins at home. A glance at some of those facts—facts touching every citizen of the United States—which he put across in three of his early fifteen-minute broadcasts, shows why Godfrey believes the title of his program—and why he wants you and you to believe it.

Godfrey talked about sugar rationing. By cutting the ration from one and a half pounds to three-quarters of a pound per person per week, he pointed out, each person can save enough sugar to make over 20 pounds of smokeless powder a year. That's "why" enough.

He talked about wool, and explained why it's going to take two-thirds of what we have to keep our army equipped. The average citizen uses two and a half pounds of wool a year. The average soldier needs 100 pounds a year. That's "why" next year's suit won't be so woolly.

He talked about refrigerators. By cutting our refrigerators, the Government saves enough steel for 7000 light tanks, 5000 medium tanks and 1,500,000 machine guns. Enough aluminum for 900 heavy bombers, enough rubber for 4,000,000 army raincoats and 1,000,000 gas masks. Enough tin for 5,000,000 tin cans, Which is probably "why" enough for Mrs. Housewife to be content with that old refrigerator—when it might save the life of her son.

He talked about that delicate matter of the feminine silhouette—foundation garments—and explained why they will be going back to whalebone and cloth. Enough rubber was used in the foundation garment industry last year, it seems, to outfit 7,500 medium tanks. All of which is probably "why" enough for women, anyhow.

Godfrey talked about automobile tires, too, which used to be made of rubber from the Dutch East Indies—and Malaya. It takes the rubber for four auto tires to make two tires for a fighter plane. It takes seven auto tires to make one tire for a big bomber. It takes the rubber ordinarily used in 125 tires for one medium tank. So you see, Mr. Godfrey pointed out, why you shouldn't take that Sunday pleasure ride. He talked about silk stockings and nylon stockings—and just how much good the ladies will be doing when they start wearing rayon and cotton stockings.

That isn't all Godfrey talked about in three 15-minute broadcasts, but it already seems enough to prove why victory begins at home.

Godfrey believes it's easier to give up a little something if it's known why the sacrifice has to be made. That's why he has the radio program.

Godfrey, and the Government behind Godfrey, already knows that victory begins at home. After every broadcast he and the Government hope a few more people know it—and act upon it.

CAPITAL WHIRL

—by Hope Ridings Miller—

THERE'LL BE NO SPIES in North Carolina. Not for long, anyway. Having been suspects for long enough to cause a night's sleep to be spoiled for them, L. A. H. Peters and Jonkheer G. C. D. Hooft Graafland can vouch for that.

This is the story. En route to Washington after a business trip to the Caribbean not long ago, Agricultural Attache Peters and Commercial Secretary Graafland stopped off in a small North Carolina town to spend the night. At dinner, in keeping with their custom, the two talked to each other in Dutch . . . finished the meal . . . and then retired for the evening, entirely unconscious of the fact that their talking in a strange tongue had caused considerable discussion in the dining room.

Somebody who had heard them vowed they were speaking German. Somebody else suggested they might be spies. Still another declared he had suspected them from the moment they set foot inside the inn. Pretty soon, in the minds of everybody around the place, they WERE spies.

So-o-o, at 1:30 a. m., Mr. Peters and Mr. Graafland were roused out of bed and subjected to a detailed round of questioning. In vain they pleaded that they were Dutch, not German, and that they were diplomats, not dastardly deceivers. But the shrewd North Carolinians were not to be fooled further. "We'll just call Washington and check on that," they said. Five hours later Peters and Graafland were released. Yes, they had made a mistake, admitted the inquisitors. But you can't be too careful these days.

IF JUSTICE AND MRS. William O. Douglas lacked a sense of humor and took themselves as seriously as any number of people in high places, a certain lawyer in a Government department might have more to worry about than he, at this time anyway, has an idea.

Seems a few days ago Mrs. Douglas was returning by train from the West Coast when she was approached by a man who said he was sure he had met her in Washington somewhere and would she mind if he sat down and talked to her a bit. She didn't mind, and he sat down; and presently they were skimming a variety of subjects.

Finally they got around to the Supreme Court. Did the lady have any preferences among the persons on the Supreme bench? He knew them all very well; could give her the low-down on every single one. Being a lawyer, that, of course, was part of his business.

Now, take the Chief Justice. Why, he was head and shoulders above every other man on the bench. Did the lady (he hadn't yet asked her name) know Stone? Well, she had seen him a few times, she said. But——

"Well, I know him very well," said the man. "And you can take my word for it, he's a grand guy. Smart, too. As for the others——"

Here the lady feebly put forth an idea of her own. She had always rather liked Justice Douglas. What did he think——

"Douglas? Oh, he's all right. But lady, if you want my opinion, there are only three men in the Supreme Court that are worth thinking about one minute—Black, Frankfurter and Stone, of course. The rest don't amount to a hill of beans."

To the very end of the trip Mrs. Douglas never divulged her identity, but she did learn from her talkative informer that he was due to plead a case before the Supreme Court some time soon, and he also took pains to give his own name and his position. He doesn't know hers to this day.

MENTION OF ONE Supreme Court hostess reminds me of another—Mrs. Owen J. Roberts. Although she had just passed, with credit, her course in mass feeding at the American Women's Voluntary Services, Mrs. Roberts was not satisfied. "I didn't give them an egg for breakfast, so I got only a B-plus. If I had given them an egg I would have made A."

She explained that the examination problem on which she fell short had to do with the diet of a group of persons after "an accident."

"I said they should be given fruit juice, oatmeal and milk, toast and coffee. I should have given them an egg besides. One egg, it seems, is the difference between perfection and B-plus."

ABOUT THE TOWN: One of the most interesting visitors now in Washington is Henk Marsman, who, with his wife and daughter, Ann, arrived a few days ago, and have been staying at the Roosevelt. If there's anybody who has A Story to tell, it is Mr. Marsman, who was in Hongkong when it fell and was interned by the Japanese from then until the middle of February, when he managed to escape to Chungking.

"You have no idea of the cruel treatment to which interned Americans and Britishers are subjected at the hands of the Japanese," he said. Incidentally, he has been asked to do a magazine article on his experiences . . . and his very good friend, Philippine Commissioner J. M. Elizalde, is urging him to write it soon.

She's smart as well as decorative, is Mrs. John Fairbank, who can tell you all about The Kingdom of the Fishes (below) which is part of a rubbing of a Chinese engraved stone slab of the second century, A. D. Such rubbings are Mrs. Fairbank's archeological specialties.

"I DON'T BELIEVE IT! I talked to her for an hour at a cocktail party the other day, and I refuse to believe it about her!"

So, almost shouted an acquaintance of Mrs. John Fairbank last week when told that that attractively vivacious lady was the author of a series of scholarly articles on "Chinese Archeology of the Han Dynasty," appearing in the Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies. And—with no disparagement of Mrs. Fairbank's intellectual appearance—it is hard to believe that she is a well-known authority on archeology. She just doesn't look the part.

However, Mrs. Fairbank comes by her academic leanings naturally. The daughter of a college professor—her father, Dr. Walter B. Cannon, is a professor of physiology at Harvard Medical School—and of a successful authoress—her mother, Cornelia James Cannon, is the author of the best seller of a few years ago, "Red Rust," and subsequent novels—it is only to be expected that Mrs. Fairbank should carve out a notable career for herself.

"IT WAS JUST CIRCUMSTANCES," explains Mrs. Fairbank when asked what inspired her interest in Chinese archeology. The circumstances, briefly speaking, are just a synonym for romance. Engaged to a history student when he was attending classes at Harvard and she was taking art courses at nearby Radcliffe College, the then Miss Cannon watched her fiance depart for China to do some on-the-scene studying of Oriental history.

Not long afterwards, she joined him in Peking, where they were married. "The outstanding thing about the ceremony," Mrs. Fairbank recalls, "was the American consular representative, Bob Buell. The bride is supposed to be the center of attention at a wedding, but not so at this one. Bob had to play in a polo tournament 15 minutes after the wedding, and witnessed the ceremony in full polo regalia, leaning on his mallet."

Then followed four years in Peking, where John Fairbank—a PhD. in history entitles him to be called DR. Fairbank—taught history at Tsinghua, the Chinese Government's University, and his wife applied herself to the study of Chinese, which he already had mastered. On the side, she kept on with her artistic interests, developed a passion for Chinese art, did some painting of her own and held several exhibitions.

• • • •

AS A VACATION spree, she and a friend decided to do a little amateur "digging." Toward this end they explored the recesses of southwestern Shantung Province, where the sight of two white women traveling alone was more than unprecedented. Looking for stones from a reported Han tomb they stumbled into two other Han tombs, at that time unreported, and exciting archeological discoveries. Plunged, however, is a better word than stumbled, for, after getting the peasants of a village to move a gigantic boulder from one tomb, Mrs. Fairbank dove face-foremost into a narrow aperture, accompanied by a small flashlight, to make pencil sketches of the interior on the back of an envelope. It is information gained on this tour that is incorporated into her most recent archeological articles.

Her greatest contribution to archeology, however, is the photostatic technique she has evolved for restoring Chinese "rubbings," which are the thin paper records of ancient chronicles carved in stone.

Back in the United States. Mrs. Fairbank had a chance to polish up her academic background in Sinology while her husband taught Chinese history at Harvard for several years. Here in Washington since September, both Mr. and Mrs. Fairbank manage to keep busy—he, at a desk in the Office of the Coordinator of Information; she, at a desk in the Cultural Relations Division of the State Department.

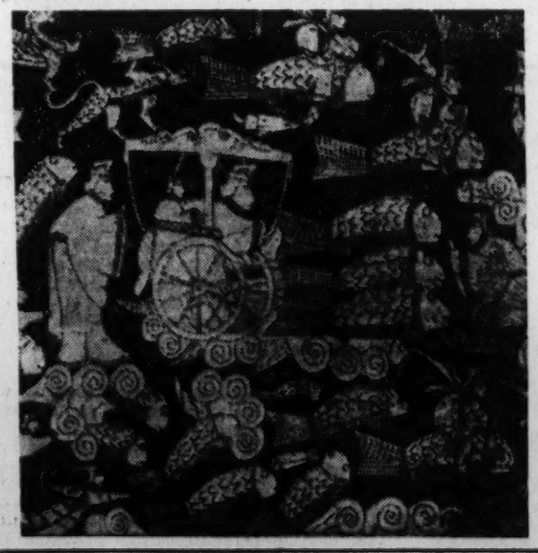
NO ONE stepping into their doll-like house in Georgetown could avoid the conclusion that the Fairbanks are intensely interested in things Chinese. Their pictures, their dishes, their rugs, their books—and most certainly their conversation which is often in the Mandarin they learned in Peking—are the tip-offs to their major interest in life.

But with all the academic surroundings of her life and of her interests, Mrs. Fairbank is still the sort of person who causes acquaintances to vehemently deny her erudition. It is hard to believe, but after all, let's look at the record.



Catherine Murr Is Bride of Ens. Plowman

ST. JAMES' Church, Mount Rainier, Md., was the scene yesterday of the wedding of Miss Catherine Murray, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Guy Murray, Brentwood, and Ensign Edwin L. Plowman, U. S. Navy, son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis W. Plowman, Washington.

Rev. A. R. Gingras performed the 7:30 ceremony, which was followed by a reception for 200 guests at the home of the bride's parents.

GIVEN in marriage by her father, the bride was gowned in white net with a torso-length bodice of lace. The skirt fell in a long circular train and her finger-tip veil was caught with a coronet of seed pearls. She carried a shower bouquet of white roses and sweet peas.

Miss Juanita Lois Murray was her sister's maid of honor and was attired in a pale blue lace and marquisette frock, a small cap of spring flowers and shoulder-length veil. The attendants, Miss Mary Elizabeth O'Brien, Miss Mary Rapp and Mrs. Marie Grabski, wore similar gowns of pastel shades and all carried bouquets of spring flowers and roses.

• • • •

WAYNE K. HILL was best man and ushers included Lieut. Gilbert Frauenheim, Lieut. James W. Condit, Lieut Charles Harbert, Lieut. J. Frank Cole and Capt. Bowman Sweet.

Following a wedding trip to Long Island the couple will reside in Washington. The bride is a graduate of McKinley High School and Strayer's Business College. Ensign Plowman, who is stationed at Anacostia, attended American University and Wilson Teacher's College.

Thomas Owens On Bridal Trip

Mrs. Thomas Goldsborough Owen, who before her marriage April 5 was Miss Doris Ellen Harlan, daughter of Mrs. Benjamin A. Harlan and the late Mr. Harlan, will return shortly from a wedding trip to Florida. The bridegroom is remaining for Army duty with the Air Corps at MacDill Field, Tampa, Fla. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Claude W. Owen.

Their marriage took place at 4 o'clock in the Woodside Church, Silver Spring, with Dr. Ralph D. Smith officiating, assisted by R. W. Burgan, pastor of the Hamline Methodist Church.

The bride, who was given in marriage by her mother, wore a gown of embossed chiffon made on princess lines with sweetheart neckline, long sleeves and full skirt with circular train. Her finger-tip veil was of tulle with coronet of seed pearls and she carried a shower bouquet of white roses and sweet peas.

Miss Betty Harlan was maid of honor and wore a frock of pale pink mousseline de sole with lace jacket and her flowers were pink roses and iris.

Claude Worthington Owen, jr., brother of the bridegroom, was best man and ushers were Arthur Branscom, Howard Stingle, Frank Cleaner and Eric Peterson.

Following the ceremony a small reception was held for members of the wedding party and close friends.

The bride attended the University of Maryland and Mr. Owen was graduated from George Washington University.

Homes' Tour Set to Benefit D. C. Institution

A house tour in Maytime with tea at its end and all for a purpose—such a fete designed to tempt both the lovers of beautiful homes and believers in purposeful-partying-only, during wartime, is now being planned for the benefit of the Washington Home for Incurables.

A number of the lovely homes in the Foxhall Road section will be opened Saturday, May 9, for the tour between the hours of 2 and 6 in the afternoon. Uplands, the home of Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, the house of Mr. and Mrs. Walter F. Chappell and the modernistic home of Mrs. Morris Cafritz will be among those opening hospitable doors for the benefit.

Tickets will be on sale at the doors of the houses and will include tea with music on the terrace of Mrs. Anne Archbold's home on Reservoir Road. The terrace overlooks the swimming pool and will be ideal for a warm sunny day, but should the weather be at its worst the tour will go on as there is plenty of room inside Mrs. Archbold's spacious house where weary tourists may relax over a cup of tea.

Washington women working for the success of the tour include Mrs. Edward R. Finkenstaedt, chairman of the board of the Home for Incurables, which is sponsoring the affair, Mrs. Theodore S. Wilkinson, chairman of publicity, and Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, chairman of the tea committee. Helping to show the houses will be Mrs. Wayne Chatfield-Taylor, wife of the Undersecretary of Commerce; Mrs. David Edward Finley, Mrs. Reeve Hoover and Mrs. Eugene Roberts.

Laura Blair Is Wed To Edwin P. Boggs, 2d

AT ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH in Charleston, S. C., yesterday, Miss Laura Lawson Blair, daughter of Mrs. Gist Blair, exchanged vows with Edwin Palmer Boggs 2d, son of Mr. and Mrs. Francis Goodman Boggs, sr., of that city.

Spring flowers decorated the church as the bride was escorted to the altar by her brother, Robert Lawson. The Rev. J. T. Stewart officiated for the ceremony at 4 o'clock.

White marquisette cut on simple traditional lines gowned the bride. The bodice of the dress featured a heart-shaped neckline and long sleeves with buttons which came to a point over her hands. A design edged the bottom of the bouffant skirt and her short veil was held in place by a Juliet cap of pearls with orange blossoms. She carried a white prayerbook and orchids.

THE MATRON of honor was Mrs. J. Conway Hunt, who was attired in pearl gray marquisette gown with long flowing sleeves and full skirt. Her veil fell over her face, and longer in back, and she carried a bouquet of Joanna Hill roses with blue delphinium.

Wearing a gown styled on similar lines but of peach marquisette, was Miss Nancy Sanders, who was maid of honor. Her bouquet also was of roses and delphinium. Best man for Mr. Boggs was Ashby Farrow, and ushers were Harry Young and Peter Boggs.

A reception was held at 6 Gibbes Street, in Charleston, the home of the bridegroom's parents. Mrs. Boggs received the guests wearing a flowered print dress with blue accessories, and assisting her was Mrs. Blair, also wearing a flower print.

WHEN THE COUPLE left for a wedding trip to Sea Island, Ga., the bride was costumed in a blue and black tweed suit of three pieces. Her hat was a blue straw skull cap with two birds, and a veil and her accessories were blue. Mr. and Mrs. Boggs will live in Beaufort, S. C.

Guests from Washington at the wedding were Miss Saunders, Mr. and Mrs. J. Conway Hunt, William D. Craig, Robert Lawson, Mrs. George Lawson, Dr. and Mrs. Montgomery Blair, jr., and Percy Blair.

The bride attended Foxcroft School in Middleburg, Va. She is the daughter of the late Maj. Gist Blair and the granddaughter of the late Montgomery Blair, Postmaster General in Lincoln's Cabinet.

Mr. Boggs is the grandson of George Trenholm, Treasurer in the Confederate Cabinet. He studied at Taft School in Watertown, Conn.

Morgans Observe Silver Wedding At Afternoon Tea

"The newlyweds left on a short honeymoon trip, after which the bridegroom will join the Army . . ." Such wedding stories are filling the society pages these days.

And yesterday the anniversary of a marriage under almost exactly the same circumstances 25 years ago was commemorated when Lieut. Col. and Mrs. Sidney Morgan entertained at a 5 to 7 o'clock tea in their R Street home.

Col. Morgan, who was then a special field representative of the Red Cross, had just enlisted as a lieutenant in World War I when he and the former Miss Ethel Creager were married in Johnstown, Pa. He has just recently been brought to Washington from Fort Leavenworth, where he was military intelligence officer for the Twenty-ninth Division.

As house guests specially come to help celebrate the silver anniversary the Morgans are entertaining Miss Helen Wilson, of Philadelphia; Mrs. Charles Button, of Narberth, Pa.; Mr. and Mrs. James Taylor, of Ardmore, Pa., and Mrs. M. J. Kist, Miss Ethel Jones, Miss Mary Brent and Miss Helen Trail, all of Johnstown.

Spring flowers decked the house for yesterday's party, when about 150 guests dropped by to wish Col. and Mrs. Morgan well. Mrs. Morgan had as her assistant hostesses, Mrs. Horace Tibbott, Mrs. L. W. Moore, Mrs. E. M. Whitcomb, Mrs. J. Russell Leech, Miss Nina Thomas and Mrs. Charles Carter.

Mary Queally Is Bride of Lieut. Maloney

THE TRANSFIGURATION Episcopal Church was the setting yesterday for the marriage of Miss Mary Curtis Queally, daughter of the Rev. John J. Queally, pastor of the church, and Mrs. Queally, to Lieut. Elbert Sevier Maloney, jr., United States Marine Corp.

The ceremony, which took place at 4:30, was preformed by the Rev. Clyde Brown.

• • • •

REV. MR. QUEALLY gave his daughter in marriage. Her gown was of white satin with chantilly lace yoke, the gored skirt falling into a long circular train. The flinger-tip tulle veil was held in place by a juliet cap of seed pearls and her bouquet was of white orchids and roses.

Miss Kathleen Erin Queally was her sister's only attendant and wore a frock of blue net with an arrangement of colorful spring flowers in her hair.

Capt. Charles Cogswell was best man and ushers were Lewis Hart, Margaret Head, George A. Christie and William Reynolds.

• • • •

After a short wedding trip the couple will reside at an as yet unannounced post where Lieut. Maloney will be stationed.

To Make Home On West Coast

After a short wedding trip, Mr. and Mrs. Everett Brown Masur, whose marriage took place here April 3, will reside in San Francisco, where the bridegroom has a position with the Federal Housing Administration.

Mrs. Brown is the former Miss Elizabeth Hall, daughter of Mrs. E. Delmont Merrill, of Dover-Foxcroft, Me., and the late Dr. Crowell G. Hall, of Hartford, Conn.

The ceremony was performed at 4:30 o'clock in the home of Mr. and Mrs. McFall Kerbey on Volta Place. The Rev. U. G. B. Pierce, of All Souls' Church, officiated.

The bride, who was given in marriage by her mother, wore a gown of white mousseline de soie with lace bodice. Her short face veil was held in place by a Juliet cap and she carried a bouquet of gardenias and fresia.

Miss Georgella Hefty, the bridesmaid, wore a pale pink frock and carried delphiniums and roses. Frederick Kraft was best man.

THE HUNT COUNTRY

By Nina Carter Tabb

NO FORMAL engagement announcement has come out yet, but when a young lady laughingly says, "I'm not denying it," congratulations are in order.

So at a recent "hunt country" party the friends of Miss Willett Leache, of Middleburg, gathered round to wish her happiness. Her fiance is Capt. William V. Munhall, United States Army, and when he arrives from Fort Benning, Ga., where he is now stationed, there will be numerous parties given for the popular young couple.

The two met only last summer at a dance given in Middleburg for Army officers when troops passing through Virginia were camped at Burrland Farm near Middleburg. Miss Leache is the daughter of Mrs. Helen Leache, of Middleburg, and the late Eugene Hunter Leache, of The Plains. She is an accomplished horse woman, a member of Middleburg Hunt and also rides to hounds with Piedmont Hunt.

The romance which began that summer evening has been watched with keen interest by the many friends of the young couple. No date has been set for the wedding, but it will take place during the summer, depending on Capt. Munhall's leave from duty.

MISS ALYS VICTORIA MATTHIESSEN and John Brognard Okie were married yesterday afternoon at a lovely ceremony at St. Barnabas Church, Irvington-on-Hudson, N. Y., at 4:30 o'clock. The bride is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Henry Matthiessen, of New York and Cobbler Mountain Farm, Marshall, Va. Mr. Okie is the son of Mrs. Houston L. Gaddis, of Piedmont Farm, Marshall, Va., and of the late Frederick Okie, of Washington and Marshall.

The bride was given in marriage by her father. Her gown of white satin was simply made with square neckline, long sleeves, tight fitting bodice and skirt which flared into a long train. Her tulle veil was trimmed with exquisite family lace, and she carried a bouquet of white orchids and freesia.

Matron of honor was Mrs. C. E. Galston, of New York, sister of the bride, and bridesmaids were Mrs. Gibbs L. Baker, of Washington, sister of the bridegroom and formerly Miss Louise Okie; Mrs. Richard Corroon and Miss Eleanor Starring, of New York. They were costumed in teal blue with bodices of taffeta silk and full net skirts. Their small hats were trimmed with fresh gardenias and they carried old-fashioned bouquets of the same.

Mr. Okie had Fred Gardner, of Bronxville, as best man. Ushers were Col. Fred W. Okie, jr., of Birmingham, Ala., and Platt Okie, of St. Louis, both brothers of the bridegroom; R. Henry Matthiessen, jr., brother of the bride; Gibbs L. Baker, of Washington; C. E. Galston, of New York; John Hyatt, of Short Hills, N. J., and Sergt. Gardner Pitinney, Fort Belvoir, Va.

Mr. and Mrs. Okie left by motor for an extended wedding trip through the South and West and upon their return will come to Virginia for a visit before he joins the Army. Among those who went to Irvington-on-the-Hudson for the wedding from Virginia, were Mr. and Mrs. Houston L. Gaddis, mother and stepfather of the bridegroom; Mr. and Mrs. John Tyssowski, of Marshall; Miss Nancy Iselin, of Middleburg, and her fiance, Ensign Charles Morgan, U. S. N. R., of Washington. Immediately after the ceremony a reception was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Matthiessen.

AS A PRELUDE to spring entertaining which this year is to be keyed on a patriotic note will be the brilliant Northern Virginia Navy Relief Ball April 22. Certainly no lovelier background than the spacious Army and Navy Country Club in Arlington could be found in the whole of northern Virginia for the party.

The other evening Mr. and Mrs. John Carlyle Herbert Bryant entertained at a delightful buffet supper party at their home, Marbert, overlooking the Potomac River, the occasion being a "get-together" for the ball committee, which Mr. Bryant heads. It was a most enthusiastic meeting with every member of the committee present, and final plans were made for making this one of the most gala balls ever held in the Old Dominion.

Northern Virginia society will come out in full force to dance for the benefit of the service. Funds are to go to the Navy Relief Society for emergency aid to families in the Navy, Marine Corps and Coast Guard. The committee, who attended the Bryant's supper party, includes Mrs. Frank Mason Dillard, Mrs. Charles Dillon and Mrs. Richard Baker, all of Alexandria; Mrs. Charles Cecil Wall, of Mount Vernon; Mrs. Clarence Norton Goodwin, Washington; Mrs. Frederick D. Richardson, Fairfax Courthouse; Mrs. Lee Boatwright and Mrs. Thurman Arnold, McLean; Mrs. Sterling Harrison, Leesburg; Mrs. J. Mackenzie Tabb, Middleburg; Mrs. Adeline Serre and Mrs. Lawrence Hoover, Warrenton.

Others interested in the success of the ball who attended the supper party were Miss Helen Lipscomb and her father, William H. Lipscomb, and Sterling Harrison, all of Leesburg; Lieut. Charles Dillon, Lee Boatwright, Richard Baker, Charles Cecil Wall, Lawrence Hoover and Welles Henderson.

"Now more than ever, music is important." American service wives echo the sentiment of London under fire by going to work for the National Symphony Orchestra's Twelfth Annual Sustaining Fund Drive. Plans for the drive, which will be held from April 15 through April 25, were made at a meeting of the campaign committee last week. Above, Mrs. William Ayres Borden, wife of Col. Borden and chairman of the Army committee, discusses the whys and wherefores of the drive with a member of her committee, Miss Julia Fiebeger.

BELIEVING the National Symphony Orchestra's campaign slogan that "Now, more than ever, music is important," hundreds of Washington women are now making preparations to add work for the orchestra's twelfth annual sustaining fund drive to their other civilian and wartime activities.

The ten-day drive for $114,000 to insure the National Symphony's 1942-43 season of Water Gate and Constitution Hall concerts opens Wednesday. Several, such as Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, chairman of the orchestra's women's committee and a member of the drive's metropolitan committee, and Mrs. R. H. Dunlap, publicity vice chairman for the campaign, have been in intimate touch with happenings in Europe during the past two and a half years and, knowing the importance of music to a nation at war, are willing to crowd already overfull schedules to help perpetuate Washington's resident orchestra.

OFFICIALLY the campaign will be launched with a gala luncheon for all campaign workers at the Mayflower Hotel at 12:30 p. m. on Tuesday, but precampaign work has been going on for several weeks and it is significant that two of the most active groups in this work have been the Army and the Navy-Marine Corps committees. Made up for the most part of women closely connected with the services and service activities, these groups are nevertheless throwing their full energies behind the symphony drive.

Actively chairmaned by Mrs. Emory Scott Land, the Navy-Marine Corps committee lists as honorary chairmen Mrs. Frank Knox, Mrs. James Forrestal, Mrs. Ralph Bard and Mrs. Artemus Gates. Active vice chairmen are Mrs. Alfred Johnson, Mrs. Chester Nimitz, Mrs. Samuel Robinson and Mrs. Harold Stark; secretaries are Mrs. J. B. W. Waller and Mrs. Hamilton Bryan. The committee itself is comprised of Mrs. Oscar Badger, Mrs. Wilder Baker, Mrs. David Barry, Mrs. Edward Cochrane, Mrs. Robert Dunlap, Mrs. William Galbraith, Mrs. James Gawne, Mrs. Thomas Holcomb, Mrs. Stamford Hoofer, Mrs. Royal Ingersoll, Mrs. Leslie Kniskern, Mrs. Henry Koonce, Mrs. Edward Macauley, Mrs. Charles Maddox, Mrs. Atherton Macondray, Mrs. Randolph Miner, Mrs. Albert Niblack, Mrs. George Pettengill, Mrs. Frederick Richards, Mrs. Gilbert Rowcliffe, Mrs. Forrest Royal, Mrs. David Sellers, Mrs. Frank Slinghuff, Mrs. Ray Spear, Mrs. Edward Sturdevant, Mrs. John Thomason, Mrs. John Towers and Mrs. Henry Williams.

The services are not alone working for the National Symphony. Nine other committees working under the general chairmanship of E. R. Finkenstaedt, with A. F. E. Horn, vice chairman, embrace almost every phase of Washington life. Perhaps the most all-embracing group is the metropolitan committee, which has the entire city for its field. Chairmaned by David B. Karrick, with Olin Dows as vice chairman, this committee is composed of Richard Bales, Mrs. Ralph Bard, Mrs. Archibald MacLeish, Miss Esther Behrend, Mrs. Peter Belin, Mrs. Harry W. Benson, Miss Barbara Bradley, Miss Sally Bradley, Mrs. Carl A. Droop, Mrs. R. H. Dunlap, Mrs. Leland Harrison, Mrs. Melvin Hall, Mrs. J. P. Hayes, Mrs. Andrew Hero, Mrs. Walter Howe of Alexandria, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Milton King, Mrs. Reeve Lewis, Mrs. Harold Marsh, Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Princess Ourusoff, Mrs. Edwin Parker, Mrs. Armisted Peter 3d, Mrs. John Pugh, Frank Rounds, Miss Marion Stevens, Miss Marion Shouse, Mrs. Alexander G. Stone, Mrs. Cuthbert Train and Mme. Wistrand.

Chairmen of the remaining committees are as follows: Business and professional, Mark Lansburgh chairman, Mrs. Foster Adams and Harold N. Marsh vice chairmen; associations, Mrs. Eugene Byrnes and Mrs. Reeve Lewis, cochairmen; Government, Postmaster General Frank C. Walker; education, Mrs. Philip Sidney Smith, general chairman; Catholic schools, Mrs. Edward Keating and Miss Mary L. McQuade; colleges and universities, Mrs. L. Corrin Strong; private schools, Mrs. Slocum Kingsbury; public schools, Mrs. Miriam B. Hilton; Orchestra Guild, Mrs. Charles Bittinger, chairman; publicity, Thomas P. Morgan, jr., chairman, Mrs. R. H. Dunlap and Robert H. Davidson, vice chairmen; speakers' bureau, Dean Henry Grattan Doyle, chairman, George A. Garrett vice chairman; suburban, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker and Mrs. Robert LeFevre.

The Service Set

By Elizabeth Henney

"OLE VIRGINNY" is going to do her part for Navy Relief. Spurred by the necessity of filling her annual quota for the Navy Relief Society, a group of northern Virginians have banded together to raise funds. After due deliberation by the committee in charge, a Navy Relief Ball was decided upon.

The date is to be April 22; the place, the Army-Navy Country Club; the time, 10 o'clock in the evening. While the big ballroom will always take care of the crowd, it is hoped that whimsical Washington will turn on some balmy spring weather so that guests may dance on the roof-garden terrace which overlooks the city, and gives such a fine view of the sparkling lights of Washington reflected in the Potomac.

SO COME for a gay evening and for Navy Relief. Dancing, however, will not be the only drawing card of the evening. There will be a galaxy of motion picture stars on hand for the occasion; historical tableaux done in costume, and several other features. It had been hoped that there would be cotillions in the Old Virginia fashion, but then it was discovered by the committee that most of the Virginia belles who are well-versed in the intricate figures of the dance would be away at school during that time, so cotillions were abandoned. Nevertheless, the program will not lack excitement. Service Set folk are advised they may obtain their tickets by getting in touch with any member of the committee.

Committee members include John Carlisle Herbert Bryant, the chairman, and Mrs. Frank Mason Dillard, Mrs. Charles C. Wall and Mrs. Charles Dillon, representing Alexandria; Mrs. Lawrence Hoover and Mrs. Adelaide Serre, representing Warrenton; Mrs. Nina Carter Tabb, Middleburg; Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Fairfax; Mrs. Lee Boatwright and Mrs. Throman Arnold, McLean; Mrs. Sterling Harrison, Leesburg, and Mrs. Clarence Norton Goodwin, Washington.

MR. AND MRS. BRYANT, by the way, entertained the committee on Monday evening at their home just outside Alexandria, at a combination business and pleasure affair; committee meeting followed by buffet supper. Plans were discussed and worked out in detail during the evening.

There was, by the way, during the evening, a good deal of good-natured joshing and questioning about Mr. Bryant's eligibility to serve on the committee of a Navy Relief Ball since he is to join the Army as a second lieutenant tomorrow. But considering that four of his uncles are admirals (one of them Admiral A. C. Pickens, of Alexandria), and that his brother, Ensign Arthur C. Bryant, jr., was recently cited for heroism at Pearl Harbor, Mr. Bryant has no cause for worry on that score.

"Now more than ever, music is important." American service wives echo the sentiment of London under fire by going to work for the National Symphony Orchestra's Twelfth Annual Sustaining Fund Drive. Plans for the drive, which will be held from April 15 through April 25, were made at a meeting of the campaign committee last week. Above, Mrs. William Ayres Borden, wife of Col. Borden and chairman of the Army committee, discusses the whys and wherefores of the drive with a member of her committee, Miss Julia Fiebeger.

BELIEVING the National Symphony Orchestra's campaign slogan that "Now, more than ever, music is important," hundreds of Washington women are now making preparations to add work for the orchestra's twelfth annual sustaining fund drive to their other civilian and wartime activities.

The ten-day drive for $114,000 to insure the National Symphony's 1942-43 season of Water Gate and Constitution Hall concerts opens Wednesday. Several, such as Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, chairman of the orchestra's women's committee and a member of the drive's metropolitan committee, and Mrs. R. H. Dunlap, publicity vice chairman for the campaign, have been in intimate touch with happenings in Europe during the past two and a half years and, knowing the importance of music to a nation at war, are willing to crowd already overfull schedules to help perpetuate Washington's resident orchestra.

OFFICIALLY the campaign will be launched with a gala luncheon for all campaign workers at the Mayflower Hotel at 12:30 p. m. on Tuesday, but precampaign work has been going on for several weeks and it is significant that two of the most active groups in this work have been the Army and the Navy-Marine Corps committees. Made up for the most part of women closely connected with the services and service activities, these groups are nevertheless throwing their full energies behind the symphony drive.

Actively chairmaned by Mrs. Emory Scott Land, the Navy-Marine Corps committee lists as honorary chairmen Mrs. Frank Knox, Mrs. James Forrestal, Mrs. Ralph Bard and Mrs. Artemus Gates. Active vice chairmen are Mrs. Alfred Johnson, Mrs. Chester Nimitz, Mrs. Samuel Robinson and Mrs. Harold Stark; secretaries are Mrs. J. B. W. Waller and Mrs. Hamilton Bryan. The committee itself is comprised of Mrs. Oscar Badger, Mrs. Wilder Baker, Mrs. David Barry, Mrs. Edward Cochrane, Mrs. Robert Dunlap, Mrs. William Galbraith, Mrs. James Gawne, Mrs. Thomas Holcomb, Mrs. Stamford Hoofer, Mrs. Royal Ingersoll, Mrs. Leslie Kniskern, Mrs. Henry Koonce, Mrs. Edward Macauley, Mrs. Charles Maddox, Mrs. Atherton Macondray, Mrs. Randolph Miner, Mrs. Albert Niblack, Mrs. George Pettengill, Mrs. Frederick Richards, Mrs. Gilbert Rowcliffe, Mrs. Forrest Royal, Mrs. David Sellers, Mrs. Frank Slinghuff, Mrs. Ray Spear, Mrs. Edward Sturdevant, Mrs. John Thomason, Mrs. John Towers and Mrs. Henry Williams.

The services are not alone working for the National Symphony. Nine other committees working under the general chairmanship of E. R. Finkenstaedt, with A. F. E. Horn, vice chairman, embrace almost every phase of Washington life. Perhaps the most all-embracing group is the metropolitan committee, which has the entire city for its field. Chairmaned by David B. Karrick, with Olin Dows as vice chairman, this committee is composed of Richard Bales, Mrs. Ralph Bard, Mrs. Archibald MacLeish, Miss Esther Behrend, Mrs. Peter Belin, Mrs. Harry W. Benson, Miss Barbara Bradley, Miss Sally Bradley, Mrs. Carl A. Droop, Mrs. R. H. Dunlap, Mrs. Leland Harrison, Mrs. Melvin Hall, Mrs. J. P. Hayes, Mrs. Andrew Hero, Mrs. Walter Howe of Alexandria, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Milton King, Mrs. Reeve Lewis, Mrs. Harold Marsh, Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Princess Ourusoff, Mrs. Edwin Parker, Mrs. Armisted Peter 3d, Mrs. John Pugh, Frank Rounds, Miss Marion Stevens, Miss Marion Shouse, Mrs. Alexander G. Stone, Mrs. Cuthbert Train and Mme. Wistrand.

Chairmen of the remaining committees are as follows: Business and professional, Mark Lansburgh chairman, Mrs. Foster Adams and Harold N. Marsh vice chairmen; associations, Mrs. Eugene Byrnes and Mrs. Reeve Lewis, cochairmen; Government, Postmaster General Frank C. Walker; education, Mrs. Philip Sidney Smith, general chairman; Catholic schools, Mrs. Edward Keating and Miss Mary L. McQuade; colleges and universities, Mrs. L. Corrin Strong; private schools, Mrs. Slocum Kingsbury; public schools, Mrs. Miriam B. Hilton; Orchestra Guild, Mrs. Charles Bittinger, chairman; publicity, Thomas P. Morgan, jr., chairman, Mrs. R. H. Dunlap and Robert H. Davidson, vice chairmen; speakers' bureau, Dean Henry Grattan Doyle, chairman, George A. Garrett vice chairman; suburban, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker and Mrs. Robert LeFevre.

The Service Set

By Elizabeth Henney

"OLE VIRGINNY" is going to do her part for Navy Relief. Spurred by the necessity of filling her annual quota for the Navy Relief Society, a group of northern Virginians have banded together to raise funds. After due deliberation by the committee in charge, a Navy Relief Ball was decided upon.

The date is to be April 22; the place, the Army-Navy Country Club; the time, 10 o'clock in the evening. While the big ballroom will always take care of the crowd, it is hoped that whimsical Washington will turn on some balmy spring weather so that guests may dance on the roof-garden terrace which overlooks the city, and gives such a fine view of the sparkling lights of Washington reflected in the Potomac.

SO COME for a gay evening and for Navy Relief. Dancing, however, will not be the only drawing card of the evening. There will be a galaxy of motion picture stars on hand for the occasion; historical tableaux done in costume, and several other features. It had been hoped that there would be cotillions in the Old Virginia fashion, but then it was discovered by the committee that most of the Virginia belles who are well-versed in the intricate figures of the dance would be away at school during that time, so cotillions were abandoned. Nevertheless, the program will not lack excitement. Service Set folk are advised they may obtain their tickets by getting in touch with any member of the committee.

MR. AND MRS. BRYANT, by the way, entertained the committee on Monday evening at their home just outside Alexandria, at a combination business and pleasure affair; committee meeting followed by buffet supper. Plans were discussed and worked out in detail during the evening.

There was, by the way, during the evening, a good deal of good-natured joshing and questioning about Mr. Bryant's eligibility to serve on the committee of a Navy Relief Ball since he is to join the Army as a second lieutenant tomorrow. But considering that four of his uncles are admirals (one of them Admiral A. C. Pickens, of Alexandria), and that his brother, Ensign Arthur C. Bryant, jr., was recently cited for heroism at Pearl Harbor, Mr. Bryant has no cause for worry on that score.

Should One Child Use Another Child's Toys? Can Child Be Generous and Preserve Property? Such Questions Trouble Conscientious Mother

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I have two children, a daughter nearly 3 and a son 16 months old. I want my children to have friends, and yet I want them to learn as much good (and as little bad) as possible, in language and habits. I want them to be generous, without having their toys broken by other children. And I want them to be as safe from harm as is humanly possible for me to keep them.

Up to now, my children have played with other children only on an average of about once a week. There are no neighbor children the age of my little girl. The nearest are two 4-year-olds, a boy and a girl. These two spend most of the day playing in the street, and I don't want my children playing in the street. However, we have a nice sunny porch and back yard—which the other children have, too; but don't use.

At school, play is directed. Yet at home so many parents let their children play undirected, running in the streets, not even knowing where they are. If only they realized the importance of the pre-school period for teaching children, they would be more careful in directing their children's play and thoughts. I find it much easier to direct my children's play right beside me, while I wash dishes, dust, iron, etc. If other children are there, however, I feel that I have to stop my work, because someone is always getting hurt, or snatching toys, if I don't watch closely.

I like my children to have good toys—I mean, sturdy, safe toys—and these are usually expensive. I always appreciated good toys when I was a child and I believe a good toy gives a child more incentive to take care of it. So far, all the children in the neighborhood show a great interest in my children's toys. They come in, get very excited about them, break something each time, play a short while and leave. They monopolize the toys while here, so that once my little girl asked a friend: "May I play with this?" My little girl loves these children, yet she just does not know how to act when they are with her. She has a tendency toward selfishness that I really don't know how to help her overcome.

Please tell me what to do, in the circumstances outlined. Should I let my children play with these children more often? How can I teach generosity and care of toys? Should one child use another child's toys—and to what extent?

YOUNG MOTHER.

Relaxed Spirit Profits Parents

DEAR Y. M.: Don't rush at this business of being a Grade-A parent. Relax. Your children are scarce emerged from babyhood as yet, and cannot be expected to have made much headway in acquiring such conscious (and slow-growing) social virtues as generosity, justice, frugality, "mannered" speech and deportment and friendly cooperation nicely blended with protective firmness. Be content, from day to day, with casually pointing their noses in the direction, as it were, of ideal behavior, and don't worry about their probably consistent failure to measure up to the perfectionism you have in mind.

As for how to teach them generosity—that quality is an attitude of mind, which is best defined by the Golden Rule: "To do to others as I would that they should do to me, will make me honest, kind and good, as everyone should be." Generosity is best taught by example: by the example of never-failing consideration for another's feelings and deference to the essential dignity of his spirit. Thus, you can instill generosity in your children's personality by behaving generously to them, in all your dealings, and by kindly and consistently indicating to them the means whereby they can be generous with each other. You may encourage one to yield a point here, and the other to reciprocate that courtesy at the earliest following opportunity.

It will inevitably happen, of course, that some insufferably selfish child of other parentage will abuse their generosity. What's to be done then? You can begin to sow the seeds of philosophic realism in their social outlook. In tactful terms, gauged to their understanding, you can acknowledge the existence of selfishness in those who have not outgrown the handicap, and suggest socially approved methods of fending against it. Did Johnnie experimentally smash your Jane's best doll?—which she had sweetly let him hold? All right, she shall have another, since it was not her fault. But Johnnie may not touch her doll again—for dolly's sake. She is the dolly's mother, and she must take care of her child. This policy should be clearly enunciated in Johnnie's presence. There you inculcate a sense of responsibility toward personal possessions—but without taint of selfish withholding.

Some Destruction Inevitable In Play

A certain amount of accidental destruction is to be expected when children play—and the penalized child should be taught to meet that inevitability with no hard feelings or inconsolable outcry. Give your youngsters to understand that toy stores exist to amend such losses; that, indeed, these stores could not long survive were it for not replacement demands. But school them to put away, for safekeeping, when "company" comes, any treasured toys that cannot stand hard usage.

As to what extent one child should use another child's toys—generally speaking, I think the preponderance of available toys should be regarded as common property, while children play together as one child's guest, using his possessions. If that child has special "untouchable" toys, they should be packed out of sight before the visit begins—with the mutual agreement between himself and his mother that the measure is taken so they won't be broken.

Any rugged individual attempt to "monopolize" a game or toy, during a free-for-all play session, should be "put down" by adult authority on the instant. Enforce the rule: "Your turn now and his in a minute. Sally next. And then Johnnie's." But in the meantime, direct the attention of the waiting list to a counter-diversion. The dispute is not to be settled in terms of ownership, but in terms of fair play and co-equal consideration.

Selfishness Natural To Small Child

Your daughter's tendency toward selfishness, at less than 3 years of age, is natural and "average." She could not have outgrown the instinctive self engrossment of babyhood so early in life. But she would undoubtedly profit by a more continuous association with a fairly numerous company of children her own age. In view of your anxious indecisiveness concerning the management of children at play, it would be well to enroll her in a nursery school for at least one term—where you could observe expert administrators in action, while she absorbed the benefits of a wisely supervised "group social experience." And you might find the positively helpful answer to many half-formed questions now troubling you, by reading Dr. Grace Langdon's book, "Home Guidance of Young Children," which is obtainable from the Public Library.

All Hallows' Guild to Give Fourth Annual Flower Mart

With the presentation of the fourth annual flower mart on the Pilgrim Steps of Washington Cathedral, Friday, May 1, the work of All Hallows' Guild—that organization composed of approximately 800 men and women of all denominations and from many sections of the country—again is brought to the attention of the public.

The mart is the only public event—proceeds of which go toward carrying out the garden improvement plan of the cathedral—sponsored by the guild. Among the many interesting plants to be offered for sale at the mart will be cuttings of the historic yew and box within the Bishop's Garden, and ivy—sent over from the Canterbury Cathedral—which covers the old stone wall of the Bishop's Garden.

The Bishop's Garden is the outstanding project of the guild which was organized in 1916 for the beautifying and care of the cathedral close. Known as the Garden Guild of Washington Cathedral, it was formed "for all who are interested in making possible the most beautiful settings for Washington Cathedral, preserving the wooded hillside in its natural beauty, as well as developing walks, lawns, shrubberies and gardens in the spirit of an old-time cathedral close."

The result of the guild's work over the last quarter century is well known in the national reputation of its gardens. The Bishop's Garden, world-famed for its historic boxwood, its superb landscaping and is garden ornaments gathered from the four corners of the world, was made possible by gifts of flowers, shrubs, trees and money from garden clubs throughout the nation.

Mrs. Walter R. Tuckerman for 12 years was the guild's first president. She was succeeded by Mrs. John H. Gibbons. Last year Mrs. Charles Warren was elected president. Mrs. James E. Freeman is honorary president of the organization and Mrs. ZeBarney T. Phillips is honorary vice president.

Members of the executive committee are Mrs. Henry Leonard, first vice president; Mrs. Daniel Knowlton, second vice president and chairman of the garden committee; Miss Bell Gurnee, chairman of entertainment; Mrs. Tuckerman, membership; Mrs. Richard W. Hynson, treasurer; Mrs. Albert H. Lucas, secretary; Mrs. George W. Pepper, chairman of the out-of-town committee, and Mrs. Sherman Flint, member at large. Mrs. George A. The Food Front

Instructor—Now among the best sources of Vitamin B 1 are liver and kidney—

Mrs. Doodle—Mr. Doodle simply won't touch liver!

Mrs. Chirp—Mr. Chirp is exactly that way about kidney!

Mrs. Smugg—It's all in the way you cook liver. Not one woman in 100 knows how to cook it.

Instructor—Now kidney, if palatably prepared—

Mrs. Preen—I wouldn't have kidney in my house. Our whole family's always been that way. We never would eat brains, heart or anything like that.

Mrs. Smugg—It's all in knowing how to cook them—

Instructor—Now in the whole Vitamin B complex—

Mrs. Flytie—Oh, which is the complexion vitamin?

Mrs. Wiggle—Which is the antigray hair vitamin?

Instructor—Now in the Vitamin B complex we have first, Vitamin B1 or Thiamin—

Mrs. Twitter—Dr. Bilk's been giving me that!

Mrs. Prink—I'm taking the entire B complex. It's made a new woman out of me. Dr. Salvo says my whole nervous system was worn to a shred.

Mrs. Yeaman—I'm awfully nervous.

Instructor—As I was saying, the Vitamin B1 or Thiamin is found chiefly in the meat organs, also in many vegetables as kale, spinach, beet tops—

Mrs. Chirp—Mr. Chirp simply won't touch spinach. I tell him it's because he wasn't fed right as a child.

Mrs. Preen—Mr. Preen's the same way. His mother simply ruined him when he was little.

Mrs. Twitter—It's all in the way men are brought up. I had an awful time with my husband over green vegetables.

Mrs. Smugg—Men will eat them if they're cooked right. Now I always puree my spinach and put in a little nutmeg—

Mrs. Doodle—I have an awful time with Mr. Doodle over carrots. And he needs A for his eyes.

Instructor—Please let's get back to B1—

Mrs. Prink—Just a minute! I'd like to tell how I get Mr. Prink to eat carrots. I make a carrot frappe a la Melba with whipped cream and a cherry. It's simply delicious and men never know what it is. All you do is put the carrots through a sieve—

Mrs. Flint—I suggest that the instructor retire and Mrs. Prink take charge of the class.

Mrs. Prink—Well, I thought everybody wanted the recipe—

Instructor—Suppose we all get the recipe from Mrs. Prink after class. It's getting late and we really should finish the B complex today.

Mrs. Chubby—Is the reducing vitamin in the B complex?

Mrs. Doodle—I read somewhere that cabbage was a reducing agent.

Mrs. Chirp—Cabbage has C—I think that's the one that arouses interest in—er the opposite sex.

Mrs. Preen—Everybody ought to eat more cabbage.

Instructor—Now another factor in the B complex is nicotinic acid or Vitamin P-P.

Mrs. Twitter—Vitamin P-P is a part of the B complex. It's all on the bottle Dr. Bilk gave me.

Mrs. Prink—Does your B complex have the pantothenic acid?

Mrs. Twitter—Yes and mine has the C added.

Mrs. Chirp—Is that the one that makes people er-er—well, more romantic?

Mrs. Preen—Yes I know a woman who's feeding her husband tomatoes—on account of the C—all the time.

Mrs. Prink—That's the last thing on earth I'd want to feed my husband—in this town.

Mrs. Doodles—I don't have to worry about Mr. Doodle. He's never looked at another woman.

Mrs. Twitter—I wouldn't trust any man—

Instructor—Ladies our time is almost up! Please let me finish. Now at this time it is most important that we know all the functions of the B Vitamin, so necessary to our national vigor and morale. Only by feeding our families the right food can we help them attain strong bodies and clear minds to meet the tasks before them. Only by becoming strong, healthy citizens ourselves can we, as women, patriotically serve our Nation in this crisis. Now let us examine the functions of the B complex in relation to national health—did you want to say something, Mrs. Preen?

Mrs. Preen—Yes. All of us back here have a question, and everybody but myself is afraid to ask it.

Instructor—All right, go ahead.

Mrs. Preen—What we want to know for certain is which one of the vitamins is it that—that—well, develops charm—no I mean glamour—that is—er oomph—well what I really mean is, which is the sex appeal vitamin?

Fashions

FUNCTIONAL, warm-weather dresses will be a "wanted" item in virtually every woman's wardrobe from now on. The daytime dress at right of Eastman rayon crepe, is wearable now and late into summer. Buttoned tabs form the young-looking trim down the bodice front. Polka dot crepe touches off the neckline and sleeves. Trim and neat in appearance, this is the type of dress that is appropriate for office wear, volunteer work or committee meetings.

THE unadorned "shirtwaister" is still the favorite in the field of casual dresses. Actress Alexis Smith wears the one below in powder blue rayon jersey. The set-in belt and gay scarf add the needed touch of color. Nots the soft look to this shirtwaist dress—a style feature to watch for this season. Hard and fast tailored types are as outdated as dolman sleeves.

Thrifty Capital Women Don Sane Defense Garb

By Jane Driscoll

The Post Fashion Editor

Women all over the country are being called upon to do their part in the community and right in their own homes to conserve in the cause of defense. Already they are responding to the call for empty tooth paste tubes in exchange for new ones. They are faithfully saving scraps of paper, tinfoil and string. But even more significant is the wise, "thought out" buying which accompanies their purchase of clothes, from suits to "undies."

Impetus has been given to this "waste not, want not" creed by the Consumer's Victory Pledge, issued by the consumer division of Office of Price Administration. It states: "I will buy carefully. I will take good care of the things I have. I will waste nothing." That Washington women generally are abiding by this pledge was revealed recently by the long-range wardrobe planning of three Washington women.

Practice Saving

These typical Washington women are Mrs. Douglas Hartman, whose husband is a lawyer; Mrs. August Eberly, whose husband is in the Department of Agriculture, and Mrs. Fredrick Milner, whose husband is a lieutenant colonel in the Army. Here is a composite picture of the ideas of these homemakers, who find time for committee work and volunteer service along with their wardrobe planning:

Selection of fewer seasonal clothes—concentration on the buying of clothes that will go into summer and even next fall.

Repair of old clothes—this to be done as soon as tears, rips or missing hooks and eyes are noticed.

Revival of the basic dress—a noticeable "hanging on" to the one "good" dress in the wardrobe.

Better care of hose and lingerie—especially by more frequent launderings.

Reclaiming of "cast off" clothes—putting on new collars or changing an outdated line.

Mixing of brighter accessories—to liven dark, practical outfits.

More frequent brushing and dry cleaning—increase of both home and commercial methods.

Selection of more functional clothes—the kind that cover the long-range planning demands.

Individually these Washington women have carried out the three above-mentioned timely pledges in different ways. Mrs. Hartman, in selecting her late spring wardrobe, bought a dark sheer instead of a gay print because she can wear it into fall. "I am trying to stay away from too seasonal clothes because they do not seem to be in keeping with the times," she said.

In line with taking care of the things we have and wasting nothing Mrs. Hartman explained that she carefully repaired and cleaned all the wearable clothes in her wardrobe so that she would not have to buy any more clothes than necessary.

In selecting her spring wardrobe Mrs. Eberly chose costumes to go with the accessories she had, or vice versa, so she would not have to start from scratch, as she very often has done in the past. "This spring," she said, "I am turning out in brighter colors. Always before I have worn a great deal of black and navy. These I still wear, but I have bought coral shoes and green shoes to go with them." This busy wife, who will not have time to clean white shoes, has discovered that her colored shoes will go with virtually every outfit. She feels that women should wear more color these days, and accessories lend themselves well to strident hues.

While Mrs. Milner is changing her system of buying, she has always had to be careful in her selection, being an Army wife. She, like many other women, has faced the problem of selecting clothes which will be suitable for wear to serve her Government in the future—whether it is in some phase of defense work or volunteer service. This she feels is the special duty of women who are already here in Washington, without the necessity of calling in extra women.

Selects Functional Clothes

With "service" in mind, Mrs. Milner has selected functional clothes—colors in accessories and prints and washable ginghams. Her clothes are wearable all day long for committee meetings in the morning, luncheons, shopping, canteen work at the Soldiers, Sailors and Marines Club and a business meeting later. A dress such as a glorified shirtwaist dress in polka dot print with white frills down the front (put on from underneath so they don't touch the skin) is the perfect idea, Mrs. Milner thinks.

Color also plays a great part in this wardrobe. "I'm just violent with color this spring," she said. And yet virtually every costume she has selected will be wearable late into summer by adding or subtracting accessories. They will probably last, too, because she is doing small dry cleaning pieces herself, in addition to taking more care in ironing rayons and other fabrics.

Faith Vilas to Read Her Works At A.A.U.W. Supper Tonight

Mrs. Charles A. Vilas, poet and author, will be the guest of honor of the Washington Branch of the American Association of University Women at its supper tonight.

Mrs. Vilas, who writes under the name Faith Vilas, will read from some of her more recent books, among which is "Certificate of Flight," which has recently come from the press. Mrs. A. Remington Kellogg, chairman of the arts committee, will preside.

Wing will discuss our Latin American fellowships, and special guests of the club will be members of a number of the Latin-American embassies. Judge Lucy Somerville Howarth will serve as hostess, at the tea.

The square dance group will have as guests Saturday evening Capt. and Mrs. Holger C. Langmack who will demonstrate some Danish dances and illustrate the difference between Danish and Swedish styles of dancing the schottische. Capt. Langmack formerly an army officer in Denmark, was for several years an instructor in the United States Naval Academy and is author of "Football Conditioning" and other publications of physical training.

Mrs. Hendrickson Heads Land Army Committee

Mrs. Clarence I. Hendrickson, formerly dean of women of the University of Connecticut, has been appointed chairman of the land Army committee of the Agriculture and nutrition section of the American Women's Voluntary Services.

The land Army committee proposes to continue its program of assisting the Government agencies designated by Secretary Wickard to plan for meeting the farm labor shortage in the counties adjacent to Washington.

ATTRACTIVE VIEWS OF HISTORICAL ALEXANDRIA HOME

To the left is a view of one of the large drawing rooms with windows overlooking the garden. One of the features of this room is the exquisite crystal chandelier.

Historical Colonial Mansion Is Offered in Alexandria

For those interested in one of Virginia's old Colonial mansions, a very historical and well-preserved brick house with a rare and picturesque garden of an acre, is being offered this week by the offices of the George Mason Green Co., Arlington County realtors.

Because the premises are at present occupied by the owner, the property may be inspected by appointment only. The present owner will consider selling the property either furnished or unfurnished.

Located in Alexandria, Va., on a street that began with the history of that city, the charm and appeal of this old mansion have remained intact through the years. Constructed in the year 1795 by John Potts, many distinguished persons passed through the stately portals of this house between the years 1799 and 1825. Among these were Washington, Lafayette, Robert E. Lee, William Fitzhugh and many others whose names are revered today. In 1824 Gen. Lafayette paid a visit to this house, which was occupied at this time by the widow of his companion in arms, "Light Horse" Harry Lee, and here he met Robert Edward Lee, then a lad of 11. It was at this house that Gen. Robert E. Lee lived with his mother until he entered West Point. His mother's decision to live in Alexandria, and especially at this house, was the fact that this home was next door to the Hallowell School, considered by prominent families as an excellent preparatory school for West Point.

The house, a fine type of Georgian architecture, has been unmarred by its past owners. Its beautiful and original doorway opens into a wide center hall which is divided by an artistic arch. Rising behind this arch is a graceful stairway to the third floor. The two well-proportioned drawing rooms, one on either side of the hall, together with their high ceilings, hand-carved mantels and inside paneled shutters are typically colonial. Just off the east drawing room, and approached by a short stairway, the large and hospitable dining room has a colonial mantel flanked on either side by unusual built-in corner cupboards. On one side of this room an attractive arched window opens on a brick terrace which is sheltered by an old wisteria vine. The original kitchen, now used as a supper room, has a huge fireplace complete with crane and original Dutch oven. Easily accessible to the garden, it affords an opportunity for informal entertaining.

On the second floor, space for a number of books is provided by shelves in the hall. Two spacious bedrooms, of the same proportions as the drawing rooms below, have fireplaces and original cupboards. Two other bedrooms of adequate size, two baths and servant's room and bath complete the rooms on the second floor.

On the third floor are two large rooms, one of which has a view of the river, providing space for additional bedrooms. Also located on this floor are the original old slave quarters with a back stairway to the kitchen.

The acre garden, easily accessible from the house, contains many rare trees and shrubs. Completely private, this beautiful old-fashioned garden with its aged boxwood, magnolias, roses, wisteria and an abundance of bulbs, is impressive in its tranquil beauty.

Just a few minutes' drive to Washington over the scenic George Washington Memorial Parkway, this old home is situated on a quiet street in a neighborhood of carefully preserved old residences.

Breuningers Offer Group Of New Homes

Amid the quiet and seclusion of one of the choice residential sections of the city, yet near all facilities of intown districts, is a group of houses built and presented by L. E. Breuninger & Sons and featured by a Washington Post Display Home at 4022 Veazey Street Northwest.

This presentation residence at the corner of Forty-first and Veazey Streets, just off Nebraska Avenue, and its attendant home offerings may be inspected by driving out Massachusetts Avenue Northwest to Nebraska Avenue, turning right on Nebraska Avenue to Veazey Street and right. Another way is out Wisconsin Avenue to Warren Street, left on Warren Street to Nebraka Avenue and left to Veazey Street. (A map showing directions is inserted in this article.)

Location of the homes is a most desirable one, being within one block of transportation and close to schools, stores, churches and a shopping center. Served by bus and street car transportation and only 12 minutes distance from the White House, residents in this group will not be worried by tire and gasoline shortages. The dwellings are situated within three blocks of both public and parochial schools, providing instruction from first grade through high school.

The featured residence contains the popular first floor bedroom and bath. Its site is one of the highest elevations in Washington. It is a large corner lot overlooking a public park beyond which is fashionable Nebraska Avenue.

The home contains a large entrance hall, living room 21 feet long with built-in bookshelves, dining room, completely equipped kitchen and screened living porch. There are three bedrooms and two baths on the second floor and a large canvas-covered sun deck off a bedroom. There is also a two-car detached garage.

Brinson's Furniture & Decorating Co. have furnished the display home in colonial style. It may be inspected daily from 10 a. m. to 9 p. m.

Airconditioning Sustains Health

The defense worker, so important in modern mechanized warfare—it is estimated that 20 defense workers are needed for every soldier at the front— is looked upon as a soldier behind the lines. New low-cost homes are being built in all the defense areas to cater to his comfort and health.

The heating of these homes is very closely identified with the health of the worker and his family. A few years ago when homes became overheated, there was a dry, burning sensation in eyes, nostrils and throat. The reason of course was that there was a scarcity of proper moisture in the air. Modern winter airconditioning plants provide the proper amount of moisture.

As a result of this automatic humidification, families live and breathe in an atmosphere both pleasant and healthy. In the complete airconditioning units when the air is humidified, it is also screened and filtered so that dust is removed from it.

Cold Will Kill Bee Colonies

Adequate protection against wind and cold are of great importance in bringing a colony of bees through a cold winter, beekeepers have found. Modern insulating materials now are being used to protect hives as well as farm dwellings and barns.

Of all types of farm life, none is more sensitive to cold than bees. Bees will not permit the temperature inside the hive to drop below 57 degrees. When that temperature is reached they form a cluster and those on the inside produce heat through movement, while those on the outside provide insulation. Often this results in death from exhaustion.

A simple method of insulating hives is to proect them on all sides, ends and bottoms with detachable panels of one-inch thick insulating board.

FHA Receives Record Volume Of Applications in March

The FHA received the largest volume of applications in its history during March, Federal Housing Commissioner Abner H. Ferguson announced yesterday.

Applications for FHA mortgage insurance on new homes during this month numbered 38,207, a gain of 31 per cent over February and of 60 per cent over March of last year. The amount involved was $161,989,613.

A weekly average of 3640 new homes was started under the FHA program during the month, compared with 2790 in February and 3290 in March, 1941.

During the first three months of the year, private home construction under the FHA program, located almost exclusively in war industry areas, made substantial gains as compared with 1941. A total of 38,053 new home was started during the first quarter, a gain of 6 per cent over 1941. At the same time, applications for mortgage insurance involving new homes totaled 85,636, a gain of 55 per cent over last year.

Practically all of these homes are being built in war industry areas and are priced to sell for $6000 or less or to rent for $50 a month or less, inconformity with the Federal Government's defense housing program.

During March, there were 28,662 applications under Title VI for $114,021,738, and 9545 under Title II for $47,967,875. In addition, there were 6122 applications in the amount of $28,091,261 uner Title II involving existing homes.

Property repair and improvement loans reported for insurance under Title I last month totaled 30,240 for $11,457,468, compared with 43,317 loans for $18,959,528 in March, 1941. Many of the property repair loans now being received are for enlarging and improving existing properties to provide housing accommodations for workers in war industries.

Proper Insulation Would Save Money

Home owners and operators of apartment and office buildings could save more than $150,000,000 in fuel bills each year through proper maintenance of furnaces and more efficient firing methods, according to a survey reported to the American Chemical Society by Dr. William A. Hamor, associate director of the Mellon Institute of Industrial Research.

Proper insulation of dwellings erected during the next ten years would result in an annual saving of $125,000,000 to the owners, the report says.

Colonial Type Residence Remodeled

Charm of pre-bellum days has been held for a classic residential offering of today which has been remodeled into a home as modern as tomorrow's. Within its Colonial type walls has been carried out a program of planning and equipment matching the latest in household arrangement. Built in 1855, this handsome residence on a site of parklike proportions has been completely renovated for twentieth century living. It combines the finest of the old with the best of the new.

Located at 3039 Davenport Street Northwest, it is in the fashionable Forest Hills section, close to Rock Creek Park and surmounts an eminence which affords an endless view of smart dwellings, broad lawns and large trees. It is a section providing the country's quiet restfulness within reach of the city's conveniences. The home's old-time glamour is preserved in large rooms, wide fireplaces, graceful winding stairways, random width flooring, cool terrace and dignified porch. Its modernity is reflected in air conditioning, room-sized closets, efficient kitchen, two-car attached garage and third-floor recreation room extending full length of the house and large enough for the dancing of 15 couples.

Presented through the office of J. Rupert Mohler, jr., this property represents one of the most complete modernization projects in the city.

Large Residential Presentation in Northwest Washington

It was a job so thorough in detail that the rock foundations of the structure were excavated for a full-sized basement reinforced by steel beams and kept dry as the upper floors through an elaborate tiling and drainage system. Large stones from the cellar excavation were employed to artistic advantage in an attractive wall for the rear garden, terraced, flagstoned and large enough for handball, badminton and tennis courts.

An authentic Southern Colonial farmhouse type, this historic house was recently restored into a magnificent home. New in every detail, it retains the simplicity of earlier days. Super-structure and lines have been maintained carefully. Its restoration has been a most thorough one. Sturdiness of its construction precludes shrinkage of wood, settlement, plaster cracks or broken corners.

There is new hard wall plaster over metal lath and fireproof plaster board thoroughly insulated with rockwool. All plumbing is new, pipes being of heavy guage copper and fixtures of vitreous china. Heating equipment is of oil-fired, air-conditioned type with automatic moisture control and summer cooling. All floors are of heavy random width oak planks screwed and pegged.

The spacious center hall with its circular stairway immediately re-creates the Colonial atmosphere that pervades both exterior and interior. A large, square living room with period fireplace is most unique. The spacious and bright dining room has quaint, built-in corner cupboards and the pine-paneled library, or den, at the rear of the living room, has a vista of the garden. A first floor lavatory adjoins this room. The kitchen is of all-electric type.

A rear stairway with one continuous walnut rail to the third floor is most unusual. All of the second floor bedrooms are of ample size permitting comfortable placement of furniture. Three of the four bedrooms will accomodate twin beds and the fourth is a pine-paneled bunkroom. Two of the three tiled baths have showers. The third floor recreation room is flanked with storage and cedar closets behind the paneling. The large cellar houses air-conditioning, heating and cooling unit, laundry trays, a lavatory and facilities for maid's room and bath.

The house of red brick fronted with a white columned porch, is covered by heavy Vermont slate roof with copper flashings, gutters and downspouts. It is weather-stripped, screened and caulked. Location is in one of the city's select residential sections, close to activity. Set back 100 feet from the street and surrounded by large shade trees, the house has a site comprising nearly an acre, offering privacy and space for outdoor entertaining and recreation. Finest workmanship and materials were employed in this home which will preserve its strength and distinction for years to come, with little care and expense. It is open for inspection today from 11 a. m. to 7 p. m. Other days by appointment.

New Type Heating Controls Elimnate Jinx in Homes

New automatic heating controls have practically eliminated an old heating jinx in homes. With the earlier and less efficient controls, a difference between high and low might have been set at but one or two degrees. Yet, engineers point out, almost invariably whn the maximum had been reached, the accumulated heat in the furnace or boiler would carry the room temperature up two or even three degrees higher. On the other hand, when the minimum temperature had been reached, the room—especially in extremely cold weather—would often cool at least a couple of degrees lower.

Diligent study by skilled control and heating technicians uncovered the causes of this erratic performance and led to the creation of new instruments designed to overcome it. Now there is a regulating device for each type of furnace and boiler whch may be easily tuned to the heating needs of the home in which it is used. This device keeps excess heat in check while permitting an adequate flow of warmth as called for by the thermostat.

Another ingenious instrument heads off any "sagging" of room temperature below the degree set. It does this by automatically feeding a few ounces of coal each hour to the small pilot fire during hours (or even days) when no heating is needed. This economical and efficient device keeps the furnace slightly warmed and ready for instant response at a moment's notice. Smooth, healthful temperature control, the outstanding characteristic of automatic home heating, is said by engineers to depend upon these little-known instruments fully as much as on the thermostat itself.

Insulation Board Products Needed

Supply shortages in many lines have created an increased call for materials which serve several purposes at one time, lumber dealers report. Insulating board products especially are in demand. Boards for interior finish do three jobs at one time—insulate, decorate and quiet sound.

Insulating board sheathing provides wall rigidity and insulation and eliminates the need for building paper or felt. In lath form, the board provides a firm plaster base, with insulation as an added value.

AN HISTORIC HOUSE—A MAGNIFICENT HOME

3039 DAVENPORT STREET N.W.

A REAL SOUTHERN COLONIAL FARMHOUSE

Original House Built in Pre-Civil War Days

RECENTLY restored and thoroughly modernized new in every detail, but retaining the rare charm and simplicity of early Colonial days. The super-structure and lines of this lovely house have been carefully maintained. This is an extraordinary job of restoration and has many advantages over the newly-built houses of today. There can be no shrinkage of wood, no settling—therefore, no serious plaster cracks, no broken room corners. There is new hard wall plaster over metal lath and fireproof plaster board; thoroughly insulated with rock wool. All new plumbing—pipes of heavy guage copper and the best of vitreous china fixtures throughout. Oil-fired air-conditioned heat with automatic moisture control and summer cooling. All floors are of heavy random width oak, screwed and pegged.

Upon entering the spacious center hall with its circular stairway, the charm of this lovely Colonial home is immediately apparent. The large, square living room with its colonial fireplace is most unusual; large, bright dining room with built-in corner cupboards. Pine-paneled den or library to rear of living room overlooks the garden with its flagstone terrace. 1st floor lavatory adjoins. All-electric kitchen modern to the last detail. A back stairway with one continuous walnut rail leads to 3rd floor. Second floor bedrooms are not wastefully large, but of ample size to permit comfortable arrangement of furniture; 3 of the 4 bedrooms will take twin beds; one is a pine-paneled bunk room. Three tile baths, two with shower. Large cupboard space. 3rd floor recreation room of unusual size and design; many storage cedar closets. Large, dry cellar contains air-conditioned heating and cooling unit, laundry unit, lavatory and space for maid's room and bath. Heavy Vermont slate roof with copper flashings, gutters and downspouts. Weatherstripped, screened and caulked. 2-car attached garage.

This stately red brick home with its tall white columns, is situated in the heart of one of Washington's finest residential sections and is convenient to everything. There is a real country atmosphere about this house nestling among giant shade trees and setting back over 100 feet from the street on nearly an acre of ground; affording ample space and privacy for outdoor entertaining and recreation. The garden is walled and artistically fenced. The best of workmanship and materials were used in restoring this fine old home, and with minimum care and expense will continue an outstanding home for generations to come. Seldom is such a property as this offered for sale.

Francis A. Murray, former president of Washington Real Estate Board and vice president of H. G. Smithy Co., was recently appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to serve a two-year term on the recently created Motor Vehicle Parking Agency. The agency was created by an act of Congress to provide facilities to remote development of off-street parking facilities to relieve traffic congestion. Richard J. Murphy, executive officer of Washington Automotive Trade Association, was named to serve as executive director.

MURRAY

J. C. Nichols, Kansas City, has been reappointed by President Roosevelt to serve a fourth term as member of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission. Chairman Frederick A. Delano of the commission stated, when announcing Mr. Nichols had agreed to accept the six-year appointment: "This is particularly pleasing to me because Mr. Nichols and I are the only two members left who were appointed when the commission was organized by act of Congress in 1926. We have worked side by side for the Nation's Capital through all these years. We felt Mr. Nichols had outstanding qualifications when he was appointed in 1926 but these 16 years of experience on the commission have made his services much more valuable. Few residents of Washington know the problems of the Nation's Capital as intimately as does Mr. Nichols."

Robert B. Whitaker, Kenosha, Wis., former chairman, Brokers Institute, National Association of Real Estate Boards, addressed a luncheon meeting of the brokers group of Washington Real Estate Board, at Ambassador Hotel, last Thursday. Wesley Buchanan, of the local group, announced another meeting for April 23, and introduced the following distinguished guests: Herbert U. Nelson, Chicago, executive vice president, National Association of Real Estate Boards; William Mac Rossie, New York, president, American Institute of Real Estate Appraisers; Paul S. Bomberger, former president, California Real Estate Association; Frank Cortright, Philadelphia, executive secretary, Home Builders Emeogency Committee.

Attendance of some 300 to 400 association representatives is expected to consider war policies which will be the chief concern on the agendum. Mr. Kreutz will discuss "Holding and Building Savings Volume during the War Period;" and Mr. Kefauver will be one of four participants in a two-hour panel discussion on "War Policies for Savings and Loan Associations."

Homes Might Be Modernized

Owners of large homes are urged to convert their residences into modern apartments or rooming houses. In the defense areas where living quarters are at a premium, property owners will find the building and allied industries ready to cooperate in every way in the "repair for defense" program.

An inexpensive way to build new walls and partitions is with colorkote insulating board panels which not only build but decorate the walls. These panels come in attractive pastel tints, and because of their acoustical qualities are also desirable in buildings where a large number of people are living.

Shower Device Has Self-Cleaner

A new shower and bath combination has a self-cleaning shower head with a spout which automatically makes the water flow into the tub after the shower has been completed.

Here's how it works: The bather opens the supply valves. When the proper water temperature is obtained the water can be switched to the shower by lifting a button on top of the spout over the tub.

The pressure of the water holds the transfer device in the nozzle in this position until the supply valves are closed, when the transfer device drops automatically by gravity to its former position.

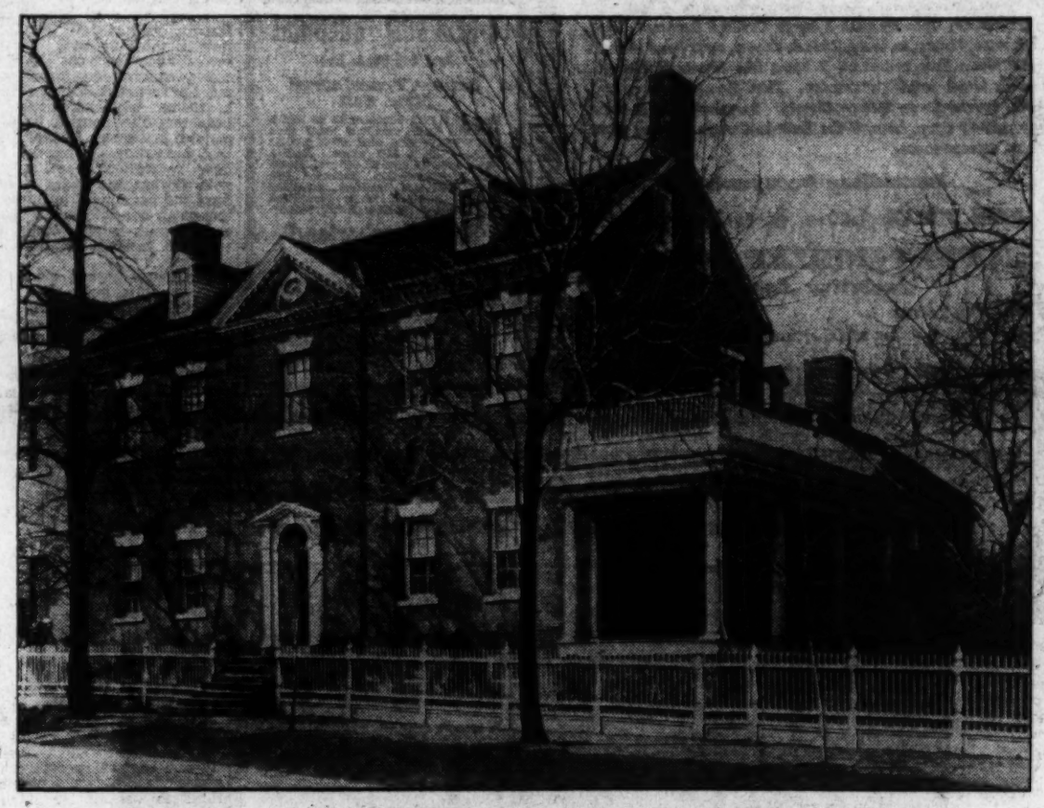
Rich in The Tradition of Historic Alexandria, Virginia



With Rare, Secluded Garden Setting of One Acre.

Attractive Center Hall

Original Kitchen Now Used As Supper Room

SITUATED on one acre in old Alexandria, Virginia, this historic Georgian brick residence is offered for sale due to a change in the owner's plans. Located on a quiet street, a short distance from the George Washington Memorial Boulevard, this home is within 15 minutes of downtown Washington.

On a street where the rich tradition of the past has been carefully preserved, its ivy-mantled walls look out over a completely private and rare old garden of an acre. Despite necessary modernization, this house has retained all of its colonial charm and appeal.

First-floor rooms include wide center hall with an impressive stairway to the third floor; two well-proportioned drawing rooms, one on either side of the hall, with hand-carved mantels, inside paneled shutters and paneled chairboard; large step-down dining room with colonial mantel flanked on either side by original cupboards. An unusual arched-window on one side of this room opens on a brick terrace. Just off the dining room, the original kitchen has been converted into a charming supper room. A wide old brick fireplace with original crane and Dutch oven lends an informal air to this room. Easily accessible to the garden, it can be gracefully used for informal entertaining. A large well-equipped kitchen completes the rooms on this floor.

On the second floor are two unusually large bedrooms, of the same proportions as the drawing rooms below, each with fireplaces and original cupboards; two other bedrooms, each with fireplace; two baths and a maid's room and bath. Two large rooms on the third floor, with space for a bath, can easily be converted into additional bedrooms. Also on this floor are the original old slaves' quarters with stairway to the kitchen.

Bad Plumbing Can Spread Diseases

Importance of plumbing in building a strong, virile Nation is emphasized by the United States Public Health Service in a 118-page report entitled, "Plumbing and Public Health."

Particularly timely today when good health is considered so essential to an all-out war effort, the report points out how water-borne diseases may be spread by defective plumbing.

Description by the United States Public Health Service of the hazards that exist in improperly designed and installed plumbing systems is an education in the fundamentals of good plumbing that every homeowner, architect, engineer, and master plumber should acquire, the Plumbing and Heating Industries Bureau point out.

Hazards of cross-connections and back siphonage are explained in layman's terms, and sketches and diagrams help to make the descriptions clear.

The bulletin lists the various water-borne diseases and explains how each disease is transmitted. Slightly over 10 per cent of the outbreaks of water-borne typhoid fever occuring in this country from 1920 to 1937 were due to contamination of the water in the distribution system and in the majority of these cases contamination had reached the systems through the existence of cross-connections with auxiliary sources of water, the bulletin explains.

A digest of the results of research, surveys, and investigations on plumbing and health is another important section of this bulletin.

"Research in this field has followed various courses," the bulletin states, in part, "such as the investigation into the prevalence of insanitary and defective plumbing fixtures in use or for sale at any time; the determination of the causes and the effects of back siphonage and vacuum formations and the frequency of vacuum occurrence; a study of the merits of various plumbing fixtures and protective devices, and of the factors essential to the proper, safe and sanitary design of plumbing fixtures."

Findings of the American Society of Sanitary Engineering, the National Association of Master Plumbers, the National Bureau of Standards, the Copper and Brass Research Association, the American Water Works Association, and of the Public works and health departments of many cities and States show what is being accomplished by plumbing and health groups in protecting public health.

Results of a survey of plumbing in all Federal buildings in New York and Detroit to determine whether there existed any hazards to public health similar to those which were the cause of the amebic dysentery epidemic in Chicago in 1933 are summarized and compared.

"The location and correction of several separate installations having a high hazard rating has indicated the existence of such dangers, which—even though few in number—contribute considerably to the health hazard present in the plumbing systems in use today," the Public Health Service bulletin says about this survey. "Elimination and prevention of the installations of this type of fixture and connection in the future may be assured through a rigid control of the plumbing being installed in a building and through the education of plumbers.

Sand and Whitewash Combat Fire Hazard

Local fire departments have consistently warned that accumulated trash in basement or attic is a fire hazard. Now Red Cross and civilian defense classes are instructing women to sand attic floors and whitewash attic and basement walls to lessen chance of fires in case of bombing.

Shelter Sites Require Study

A bomb shelter is usually safer if placed in the center of a building rather than in the outside corners. The shelter must be close to the staircase, and an emergency exit must be provided so the occupants will not be trapped, should the staircase be destroyed.

The basement must be securely constructed and reinforced before the shelter room is begun. Heavy timbers should be slid into the cellar for reinforcing the ceiling construction in case the house collapses. Stout studs are spiked to these new beams which are added to reinforce the existing ceiling.

The first step is the construction of the protecting walls of the room. Sections of wallboard are nailed to studs. When the sides of the protecting walls are completed, sand is poured in between the wallboard sections.

A blackout light should be installed to provide sufficient light under emergency conditions. Electric equipment should be turned off individually in case of an air raid. A stoker can be kept in operation during a raid, point out engineers. Even in the event of a power failure, the home can be kept warm by hand-firing the furnace temporarily.

Home Insulation Aids in Defense

No less an authority than the Government has referred to home insulation as an effective national defense measure. Insulation is one of the first steps to be taken by both the Nation and the individual in conserving the fuel resources of the country. The manufacturers of insulating materials have developed their products to the point where there is a type of insulation available for every size and type of dwelling.

To omit it from a new house, or fail to use it in modernizing an existing one, point out insulating technicians, is usually an indication of ignorance of its value. Insulation is one item of the many which go into the making of a house that actually not only pays for itself but continues to pay dividends during the life of the structure.

Thinning Is Vital

The proper thinning of shellac is a vital part of its correct application. It is seldom used as it comes out of the can, but is thinned to the proper consistency with denatured alcohol.

Defense Train Tours India

According to the publication "Indian Information," a Defense Services Exhibition Train is now touring India to show the state of preparedness of India's defense forces. During its seven months tour—covering approximately 15,000 miles—the train will stop at nearly 200 stations, giving even the remote villages a chance to see what the sailors, soldiers and airmen of India are doing.

The length of the train exceeds 1000 feet and the weight is so great that it will sometime require no less than three engines to move it. The whole train is painted in several colors. Some coaches have been painted in the same manner that ships at sea in wartime are painted.

Others have been painted in army and air force camouflage colors. Although the whole has been done in camouflage style, no effort has been made to make the train invisible. In fact the colors are guaranteed to attract attention. Some coaches have land, sea and air battle scenes painted on the sides.

Keep Heat Down During Night

For each degree that the temperature is maintained over 70 degrees, the fuel cost goes up approximately 3 per cent. Fuel costs go down about 2 per cent for every degree below 70. British homes are being kept at a lower temperature this year. Here, substantial fuel economies can be obtained by maintaining lower temperatures at night either in the sleeping quarters or throughout the house.

Newest developments in day and night temperature control is a dual system for a two-story house. There are two thermostats and two electric pumps circulating the water to the radiators. The second floor thermostat is equipped with a syncrostat which is set for a lower degree for a large part of the time. Second floor bathrooms can be put on the first floor circuit so they are warm throughout the night.

Plumbing Manufacturers Design New Style Sinks

Fitting today's low-cost market of military, naval and defense housing, plumbing manufacturers have designed new styles of enameled cast-iron flat-rim sinks.

These new sinks range in length from 24 to 60 inches. All are 21 inches wide for building into metal or wood cabinets. The length of the sink is determined by the style. The 60-inch model has two basins and two drainboards; the 24-inch fixture is a single-compartment, flat-rim model for building in. These new low-price sinks made their debut with two other types—the single-compartment, double - drainboard style, and the single-compartment single drainboard.

Each sink has an integral soap dish and a wide, full-length ledge that provides a waterproof surface for cleansers and brushes, or a safe spot for glassware during dishwashing. This ledge is the base for the built-in fittings—the single spout that can be swung back out of the way, or adjusted to fill either compartment of the sink, and the hot and cold water supply fittings.

The basins on all of these new sinks are 8 inches deep, and are fitted with combination stoppers and strainers.

New Thermostat Has Special Dial

A new type of thermostat has a special dial which enables the homeowner to adjust the instrument in accordance with the individual control characteristics of the heating system.

No two heating systems are exactly alike; they differ in firing rate and type of firing equipment, size and arrangement of pipes, and kind of fuel used. The special dial enables the operator to obtain various adjustments in addition to the usual type of temperature setting.

Furniture Men Ready to Outfit Defense Homes

When America's war workers, moving into the new homes built for them by the Government and by private industry, start to furnish their new abodes, they will find near-by retail home furnishing merchants ready to serve them.

That was the pledge of home furnishings manufacturers and dealers made to Government officials at a conference called here last month to tackle the tremendous job of insuring that the necessary furniture, floor coverings, bedding, etc., needed to turn defense hourses into homes, is available when it is needed to turn defense houses into right styles and at the right prices.

The need for speed was a keynote of the conference. Of the 159,474 dwelling units assigned for construction, more than 50,000 are already occupied or available for occupancy, it was reported. Most of these homes have been furnished by local dealers with merchandise in stock and, although it was emphasized that considerable furniture suitable for the new, small homes is on retail floors now, it was admitted that production must be stepped up if the industry is to keep pace with the Federal building program.

Defense houses are rented to their tenants with stove and refrigerator included. Other home equipment must be provided by the occupants. While most workers bring some furnishings with them when moving to a new location, experience has shown that in almost all cases additional items must be purchased.

Among the advice given to furniture manufacturers was:

1. Cut down the length of davenports, because the living room of a defense home contains only 160 square feet of space.

2. Trim down the customary dimensions of breakfast sets, which must fit into tiny alcoves, all requiring a smaller-than-average table.

3. Provide upholstered living room chairs which are comfortable, but which do not require too much floor space.

4. Add to the height of chiffoniers what must be taken from width and depth.

5. Experiment at making more dual purpose furniture, which will serve many needs while requiring little floor space, but keep such furniture practical. No gadgets wanted!

6. Design specifically for defense houses additional small-scale furniture.

In addition to living room and dining alcove, and kitchen, 15 per cent of the new defense houses have one bedroom, 60 per cent two bedrooms, and 25 per cent three or more. The first bedroom usually contains 120 square feet of space and the second and third, when included, have 100 square feet and 70 square feet, respectively. Obviously, furnishings for these rooms must be small in scale to be correctly proportioned to their surroundings.

Although it was expected that financing would be a major problem to be solved in connection with the furnishing of defense homes, furniture dealers have reported little difficulty thus far. "Regulation W," the act governing the granting of consumer credit, requires a down payment of 10 per cent, with the balance paid out in 18 months, for furniture. On appliances, the requirements are higher, but this has caused no trouble as the major appliances are provided with the house.

According to word from the various furniture centers, furnishings especially designed for small homes in general, and defense housing in particular, will be featured by most manufacturers at the spring wholesale markets, and by this summer dealers will be able to provide the right kind of merchandise in greater volume and variety than is possible now.

Committees of the National Retail Furniture Association and of the two major associations of furniture manufacturers, appointed immediately after the Washington conference, are already at work on various phases of the problem involved, it has been announced.

"The demand is not for fancy, luxurious or elaborate furnishings," Sherwood L. Reeder, assistant administrator, USHA, summed up. "Occupants of defense houses are plain people—the backbone of the Nation. The need is for plain, simple, sturdy designs that will fit into modest surroundings."

Basement Must Have Proper Ventilation

Dampness in the basement and undesirable odors resulting from dampness normally can be eliminated through proper ventilation, according to technical experts.

Basement windows often must be placed partially or almost entirely below the ground level and outside areaways used to obtain the desired natural light and ventilation.

Areaways for basement windows are often made too small. To provide effective light and ventilation, the width of the area should be at least equal to its depth. Its length should not be less than the width of the masonry opening of the window. The bottom of the area should be about 6 inches below the top of the masonry sill of the window. The use of deep areas from which leaves and snow cannot be readily removed should be avoided.

Brick, poured concrete, concrete blocks, and corrugated galvanized-iron sheets may be used for areaway walls. When built of masonry, areaway walls should be 8 inches thick. When concrete is used, the thickness of the walls may be reduced to 6 inches. The walls should rest on firm ground, and to prevent damage due to frost action the bottom of the walls should be carried below the frost level normally experienced in the locality.

Efficient drainage of the areaway is important. Good drainage may be obtained by covering the area bottom with a layer of cinders, broken stone or gravel, or with brick laid in sand and with open joints. When the soil is porous no other special provisions for drainage will be needed. If the soil is of a type that does not permit rapid drainage, it is advisable to provide for positive drainage of the areaway by use of a pipe installed to carry water away from the building.

Rationing May Even Be Good for You

By Clarke Beach

Wide World Writer

Every American presently will have a ration card.

This first ration card, which will entitle you to your allotment of sugar, probably will be issued in a week or so. Already a selective rationing system governs sales of tires and automobiles. To buy them, you must first convince a rationing board that you need them for essential civilian activities.

Thus in a mild way America enters wartime rationing. Other ration cards eventually will take their place in your pocketbook next to your sugar card; but it is unlikely that rationing here will be carried as far as it has been in Europe or Japan. One informed official guesses that no more than a dozen items ever will be rationed in the United States.

Economists differ widely in their opinions about rationing. Some regard it as an unpleasant necessity, to be employed as little as possible and only as a last resort. That seems to be the viewpoint of the head rationer, Leon Henderson, Director of the Civilian Supply Division of the War Production Board.

Other economists think that rationing is a good idea and there ought to be more of it. Given wartime shortages and price rises, rationing has a beneficent effect, and, they say, does some lasting good. People in Britain, for example, are getting used to eating more green vegetables and wholemeal bread, instead of loading up on a lot of meat and fancy, rich foods.

The primary purpose of rationing is to provide a fair distribution of essential commodities which are running short—or which people hoard in panic lest they later be denied a full supply. Hoarding creates an artificial shortage. If prices are controlled the poor can fare as well as the wealthy under a rationing system.

Decrease Consumption

The secondary purpose is to decrease consumption and thus to preserve a dwindling supply. But this doesn't always happen. Sometimes rationing increases the demand, as in the case of cheese in England. When a person has a ration card he places a high value on the item it entitles him to purchase. He is likely to buy it whether he wants it or not. People vary in their tastes. Thus rationing of a commodity is bound to allow some persons more than they normally buy, while others are allowed less than they want.

The problem is to spread a scarce supply evenly over all sections of the population. It is extremely damaging to the morale of the workingman to see some well-to-do person buying up all the supply of an essential commodity. Often in the past year certain items of food and clothing which were not rationed have disappeared from the market in Great Britain. Only in the past few months has rationing been extended there to practically all essential items which are scarce.

Germany had ration cards printed as early as 1934 and began to ration in 1939. While political pull enables a limited number of Germans to evade the rationing system, on the whole, the Reich's store of food, clothes and fuel is equally divided among the people, and observers credit this with contributing to the Germans' morale.

In Italy, where the war is unpopular and rationing was imposed only after hoarding and profiteering had caused great suffering, morale is low.

Britain was slow to adopt rationing, largely because the ministry of information had pointed with horror to the extensive rationing in Germany, implying that it betokened near starvation and economic weakness. The result was a popular prejudice against the ration system.

The government felt it had to avoid rationing as long as possible.

The school of economists who want more rather than less rationing say that the public must be taught to be more rational about the whole matter. Instead of associating rationing with queues waiting outside of stores and with hungry families at home, these economists say, people ought to think of it as providing orderly distribution and adequate supply for all. Rationing prevents queues rather than causing them, they say. They regard rationing as one of the natural wartime controls. But none of these controls is sufficient in itself if demand is great and supply is low.

If there is rationing without price control, many items will be out of reach of the poor. In Great Britain now bacon is so expensive that only three out of five persons are able to afford to purchase the amount of bacon allowed them.

If there is price control without rationing, persons with the money to spend can buy up and hoard large quantities of scarce items.

Limiting the supply of raw materials to manufacturers and the supply of processed goods to wholesalers and retailers curtails consumption. But without rationing, the retailer can sell to favored customers, and leave the rest to do without.

Another method of limiting demand is cutting down the purchasing power of the public by imposing higher taxes and selling defense bonds. This takes money out of the pockets of the consumers and proportionately decreases their ability to buy goods, but it can never be carried to the point where it will substitute for all other controls.

Those who oppose extensive rationing call it a nuisance to individuals and a burden on the Government. It requires a large organization, they argue, to administer rationing—thousands of persons whose services are needed elsewhere.

The only items which should be rationed, they say, are those which are essential to the consumer and for which no adequate alternatives or substitutes can be found.

Certain items of food and clothing are the only items likely to be placed under the over-all rationing system. Selective rationing, the type used for autos and tires, probably will be adopted to channel a few other durable goods into essential civilian activities.

Many consumers' durable goods, like radios, washing machines and refrigerators, ultimately will disappear from the market as the manufacturers convert their plants to meet military needs. But it is unlikely that over-all rationing will be extended to any such durable goods, say officials in charge.

While price ceilings have been placed over nearly all of these durable goods, it is conceded that persons with ready cash will be able to buy, while persons with small income will have to stand by and see the supply disappear. There will be so few of these items available for general consumption after all defense needs have been filled, however, that equitable distribution of the small supply left would not warrant the expense and trouble of rationing. For the same reason, none of the governments of Europe have tried over-all rationing of durable goods.

Good Bedding Essential to Proper Sleep

Chicago. — "Sleep, along with proper food, has proved to be vital in maintaining vim and vigor among civilians so needed today to accomplish the victory program," according to Frier McCollister, director of merchandising of the National Association of Bedding Manufacturers, Chicago.

"In England these two—food and rest—have been found to be basic needs for defense workers," Mr. McCollister pointed out. "At the end of World War I, a report of industrial accidents in British munitions plants made to Winston Churchill, then minister of munitions, proved that these accidents were mainly caused by fatigue. During the present war, British health authorities, therefore, are looking out for the workers' rest."

Good Bedding Essential

"Proper sleeping equipment," Mr. McCollister continued, "plays a fundamental part in furnishing this good restful sleep. Many of the materials used in the production of good bedding are now needed in the war program, but the bedding industry believes that all home demands will still be met. Some alternate materials will be necessary, but changes will probably concern styling and choice of colors rather than rest-producing qualities.

"Our industry is and has been cooperating with the Government in every possible way during the present war effort. A majority of companies are busy almost night and day turning out bedding supplies for the country's armed forces. But recognizing the prime importance of proper rest on the home front, too, bedding makers are determined to continue to provide the public with the present high standard sleeping equipment throughout the emergency."

Quality Counts

Good sleep for the entire family deserves a place at the top of every patriotic homemaker's individual defense program, Mr. McCollister pointed out.

"The best sleep does not necessarily mean many hours of it, for quality is much more important in overcoming fatigue than is quantity," he declared. "Complete relaxation on a good spring and mattress for a few hours each night counts more than many, many hours on a mattress and spring filled with holes and bumps."

Insulated Barns Up Production

Over 500 million dollars will be spent in farm construction in 1942, according to Federal estimates. Farmers are being told to avoid using their greatly augmented incomes to buy additional land as they did in 1917-18, but instead to improve their properties. Food is vital in war and peace, and farmers are urged to renovate their farm buildings.

The insulation of farm buildings pays for itself rapidly, because it reduces the consumption of food and increases the output and growth of farm animals and poultry. The United States Department of Agriculture reports that where temperature of dairy barns is properly controlled, the herd will produce from 15 to 25 per cent more milk in cold weather than cows in ordinary barns.

In most parts of the country half-inch insulation boards on ceilings and sidewalls is satisfactory, insulating technicians advise. Insulation is advisable for poultry, brooder, hog and milk houses.

White Walls Brighten Monday Washing Blues

To transform a basement laundry and lighten Monday's washing blues, cement walls were all painted white, the edges of the shelves holding soaps and other supplies were painted red, and white and red figured curtains were hung at the window.

Bright decalcomania designs were applied to the walls above the tubs at well-spaced intervals and a folding porch chair was painted white and cushioned with a red pad. The rough ceiling was covered with wallboard painted white to make the most of light through reflection.

Gardens Are Big Aid In Wartime

By Phyrne Squier

"When people ask how the wars are to be endured," writes a Southern lady in "Success with Roses" magazine, "I tell them 'my Grandmother made a garden.'" This bit of wisdom supports the request of the Federal Garden Conference, organized by the United States Government.

"ore gardens," was the decision reached by the conference leaders and instructions to make more gardens went out to nearly 6000 communities.

This decision was expanded to emphasize greater proficiency and guidance toward right harvests, rightly conserved in fruits and vegetables.

Too, declared the conference leaders, we should not forget to plant flowers as well, as "food for the spirit of man." So, along with our new duties of Red Cross work, civilian defense work, and war work in general, many of us who have not tried it before will turn to gardening for the refreshment to our spirits as well as replenishment to our larders.

Beside the actual planting and cultivating, attention should be paid to garden "housekeeping." If your garden has trellises, gates or built-in seats, now is the time to approach them with a paint brush before the new growth is too far along. Make sure the wood is well dried out and scraped free from all loose-scaling paint with loose dirt brushed away. Then with good quality exterior house paint coat the wood carefully to preserve it from storm and sun. With moisture excluded, such garden constructions are good for many years to come.

And while you are garden-puttering don't forget bird houses. If you have none at present, buy some and erect them out of the reach of prowling cats. Prospective tenants are already pouring in from the South and their acquaintance is worth cultivating. Besides they will help you with your gardening by eating the worms and bugs.

Begin at once to look over your collection of garden tools, see what you need to buy—while such hardware is available—and recall, if you can, to just which neighbor you loaned those tools, now missing. Put your tools into shape by cleansing, sharpening and mending. There's no telling just how long we may need to use our present equipment, for some of it may not be easily replaced. Remember, the current vow "I will take good care of what I have" doesn't skip any possessions, let alone garden tools!

If your rakes, hoes and shovels have rusted, soak them in kerosene and polish with steel wool till they are clean again. If the wooden handles have cracked, brush your finishing coat carefully into these cracks. This will keep them solid and also prevent further moisture from entering to rot the wood. Watering cans are also prone to rust and should be kept well painted at all times. Your wheelbarrow deserves similar treatment. Don't let the wooden portions become bare and weather-crumbled from neglect. One distinctive color—or pair of colors—on all your tools will act as identification and help you call the wanderers home.

Gardeners somehow turn inventive, once their trowels are in the soil, and several smart tips drift over the garden wall from other gardeners who share their discoveries with the world at large. One tip has to do with painting black bands at 6-inch intervals along a hot or rake handle. This gives a measuring stick which is always at hand and always in demand for lining off seed rows, transplanting and so forth.

Another tells us that a coat of spar varnish will preserve and brighten the lettering on wooden garden labels, and a third, designed to help the gardner who is cramped for space, suggests flower boxes, long and troughlike in shape, to be attached to a solid wooden wall, one above the other, and filled with vines or a variety of plants. This would beautify the back wall of a shed or garage at the same time it saved space.

Old Table Rejuvenated

To rejuvenate an out-of-date, round oak dining table, its owner employed the saving grace of paint. After coating the surface smoothly with furniture enamel to blend with the room's furnishings, colorful floral designs were added to the center top.

THE GARDEN PAGE

Importance of Victory Gardens Stressed by Horticulturists

By Katherine Barrett Pozer

Victory gardens—large and small—will play an important part in this year's gardening program. There is no complacency along America's horticultural front. Agencies everywhere are being flooded with inquiries from landowners in cities, towns, suburban areas and country districts. All want to help—the only question is "How?"

The Government was forearmed for the avalanche of interest. In the middle of December a National Garden Conference was called by Secretary of Agriculture Claude Wickard and Paul V. McNutt, director of defense, health and public welfare services. There were present at the conference not only the heads of Government agencies, but State officials and horticultural experts, editors of farm and garden publications, radio editors and the officials of garden clubs and horticultural societies. Every phase and angle of our horticultural needs was discussed. From the findings of the conference and its committees a "Guide For Planning the Local Victory Garden Program" has been published by the United States Office of Civilian Defense with the cooperation of the United States Department of Agriculture. Written in simple language, the booklet gives a clear outline of the set ups which will be necessary for carrying the program to a successful accomplishment.

Five-Point Program Given

In defining the purpose of the program five points are given:

FIRST—Increase in production of fresh vegetables and fruits by more and better gardens for a stronger and healthier Nation.

SECOND—Encouragement of proper storage for family, school and welfare needs.

THIRD—The saving of money on vegetables which may be applied to other necessary foods.

FOURTH—The use of community gardens to give gardening opportunities to those who lack suitable home gardening facilities.

FIFTH—The improvement of morale and spiritual well being of individual, family and Nation by not only growing vegetables but by the beautification of home and community.

In further sections the guide covers possibilities for individual effort and the complete set up for a Victory Garden Program under local defense councils. It suggests agencies and organizations which may be of help to local authorities in acquiring suitable land and the necessary equipment for garden supplies and for the supplies for preservation and storage. The booklet has been made available through State and county agencies and will be of valuable assistance in speeding up the National Victory Garden Program.

The arrival of spring has found encouraging reports on the progress which already has been made. In both Maryland and Virginia every county has cooperated with the agricultural colleges and State officials, meetings have been held, literature has been distributed through county agents and home demonstration agents and fullest publicity has been given the subject. Excellent progress has been reported in all areas.

Interest in the Victory Garden Program has not been restricted to the agricultural and defense agencies. Joining in the general effort are national and State organizations and agencies. The department of education is giving the program its fullest support and the important school gardens are being encouraged and extended. In a recent number of the department of education's publication, "Education For Victory" there were a number of questions and answers which ably covered many of the problems of school gardens.

Young America is showing itself especially interested in the food question. The Boy Scouts, who for a number of years have included gardening in their schedule, are this year extending their efforts with the prospect that thousands more scouts and cubs will this year win the gardening merit badge. Four types of gardening projects will be included in the scout program. The work will be done under the supervision of local scout masters. First there will be work for the boy who has sufficient land at home. Then the troop garden, which may be attended as a whole or divided into plots with each scout assigned to a section. The third and fourth interests will be the community and school garden. In these the scoutmasters will ask for a section of the community garden and request that a special section of the school gardens be set aside for the work of the school scouts.

Women's organizations have been particularly interested in the program. Food for their families at home and for their boys in the forces comes very close to the women of America. The general health of the community, too, has long been a subject close to their hearts. In the Victory Garden Program, women see a splendid opportunity for necessary work for both the full time and part time worker. Women's organizations have gone ahead with their plans and church, school and women's clubs are lending their weight to the extending of local activities. Nationally, such organizations as the American Women's Voluntary Services have elaborate plans for ever increasing activities. The Washington Branch of the A. W. V. S. cooperated with the University of Maryland in the garden school and they have plans for community gardens in nearby areas.

There is enthusiasm aplenty, so much so that leaders have felt it necessary to give warnings on the placing of vegetable gardens where they have small chance of success. It is perhaps a real disappointment to the city gardeners to be told that it is wiser that they continue with their flowers, shrubs and lawn, but the necessity of these was stressed by many of the speakers at the National Garden Conference—not only with the thought that there must be no waste but that keeping homes and communities attractive was a definite need.

Fine Gardens in Cities

It is not to be taken, however, that when city gardeners are being discouraged that this means those who live in small towns and suburban areas. On the contrary, it was reported at the conference that in these areas are some of the best home gardens and that the average suburban lot can, with careful planning, produce vegetables for the family needs as well as retain its attractiveness as a family gathering place. Everything has been done to encourage the suburban home garden and carefully selected lists of the most suitable vegetables have been made up by agricultural experts.

"Wartime Gardening Means Gardening Without Waste," is the slogan which has been adopted by the Massachusetts Horticultural Society. It seems a very fitting one, for there must be no waste of time, labor or material.

VICTORY GARDEN PROGRAM

Vegetables and small fruits raised on every farm to meet the family's need for the entire year.

Intensive vegetable and small fruit gardens, wherever practicable, for town and non-farm families but lawns and flowers should not be neglected or destroyed.

Cooperation of community and neighborhood organizations in providing garden information, using demonstration gardens wherever possible.

Thorough understanding of importance of good seed, recommended varieties, proper planting, fertilization and other cultural practices.

Orderly succession, plantings to produce fresh vegetables and fruits over a long season to release canning facilities for war purposes.

Retention of greatest possible food value through careful handling and preparation of all fruits and vegetables.

You should produce more, store more, can and dry more fruits and vegetables from your Victory Garden.

Raised Beds Are Ideal For Flowers

Several Types Found Ideal, But Masonry Walls Should Be Avoided, Expert Says

By Crowell Baynes

In getting flower beds spaded and planted, many gardeners would do well to consider possibilities of raised beds for some or all of the planting space. Well-planned raised beds offer notable advantages for effecting garden construction, and also give the gardener a particularly good opportunity to cater to the preferences of special groups of plants.

On a sloping lot, one of the advantages of raised beds is particularly obvious. It enables the gardener to avoid waste of rain and of water from the hose, and the loss of soil and exposure of roots where soil has been washed away. But as a matter of fact the advantage to the plants is likely to be quite as marked on a level garden space where raised beds simplify the drainage problem and prevent troubles with "wet feet" in winter and spring, and with summer drought in clay soils that water does not penetrate readily.

On a sloping area the question of what to do practically solves itself and usually with a pleasing effect. The beds are planned in a series of descending steps or terraces, with each terrace level with the base of the wall holding the next higher terrace. On a gradual slope one end of the bed may be raised 6 inches and the other 12.

Examples in Georgetown

Old Georgetown gardens offer a good many effective examples of the use of raised beds, both on slopes and on level ground. On the level spaces it is usually unnecessary to raise the surface more than 6 or 8 inches to get the benefits of drainage.

In Georgetown some of the "retaining walls" are of brick, and only two or three bricks high with the brick laid flat to give firm support. Others are made with bricks set up on an angle along the long dimension, giving a pleasing notched border with the surface of the raised bed only two or three inches.

Some of these old gardens stem back to the days when the formal garden was more the vogue than it is today—praise be! But the charming effects possible with these geometrical raised beds filled to the brim with a riot of varied flowers is one of the features that make Georgetown garden tours a pleasure.

Most common for retaining walls hereabouts is the wall built from the common building stone available from the quarries, or from the somewhat rounded small boulders retrieved from watercourses here and there. One of the loveliest and most substantial walls of this type I've seen was built with old style paving blocks of grey granite—about three courses high.

Avoid Masonary Walls

Some gardners make the mistake of building masonry walls for this purpose. This gives an air of formality and permanence that does not fit with the gardening—and it also sacrifices one of the principal advantages—dainage. Plants in such beds are likely to suffer from wet feet and sour soil. Also mortar in the wall, prevents wall plantings. One of the real delights of well laid stone walls is that the crevices between the stones provide the choicest possible planting places for some of the best of the rock garden plants—alyssum saxatile, moss pinks, sedums, sempervivums, dianthus, coral bells, mints, and a dozen others that will grow on and in the low walls, and do much better than if planted on the level. Or garland such a wall with ivy allowing it to root and bind the wall, but shearing it back to the level of the top of the wall.

Broken sizes of stone, not quite large enough for stone walls are relatively inexpensive. Pieces from 8 to 16 inches in length, 3 to 6 inches in width and from an inch to 4 or 6 inches deep make convenient material for such a wall. Triangular-shaped stones are as useful as rectangles if laid with one smooth face out and the fin of the triangle supported in the earth of the bed. There is a knack to be acquired in laying these walls so that they will be pleasing to the outward view, a firm support for the soil in the bed, and still leave chinks for plants to grow out from the wall.

Wooden Planks

A third material for the retaining walls is wooden planking, preferably of creosote-treated cypress or redwood held in place by stout stakes rather than nails. Planks of 2-by-8 dimensions painted a dull green make satisfactory walls, and if placed on the surface of the old soil at the low side of the original site will usually make drainage effective. They are not as desirable, however, as stone or brick walls, as the boards cut off considerable aeration of the soil.

Plants grow better, as a rule, in such beds. There are two reasons, I think. First, the condition of the soil definitely is favored by the excellent drainage and good air exchange. Second, the gardener who is willing to go to the trouble of providing these beds is almost certain to take on the added work of filling them with really choice "hand-made" soil. And that is where the plants get a break!

Such a bed calls for something better than just "any old soil" available. Added soil is called for, and this has to be supplied from elsewhere. With sharp drainage assured, the gardener has to give thought to water-holding capacity of the soil he will use to fill with. This suggests compost, granulated peat, or leafmold, or any combination of the three sources of humus.

Some sand will not be amiss—and good garden soil or a load of topsoil from a dealer. Mix these three elements with a liberal sprinkling of common sense and as much knowledge as possible of the needs and preferences of the prospective plants to go into the beds and modify or improve the soil from season to season as the plants express their preferences.

Mixture Used by Florists

A good mixture to start with will be about one part plaster sand, two parts humus and three to five parts loam, according to how much humus there is in the loam. This is a combination roughly like what the florists mix for their greenhouse benches, and is likely to be good enough to support really first-class bloom in a raised border.

All this may sound like altogether too much work to be devoted to a bed of flowers. It is really an investment, not an expense—particularly from the labor standpoint. A lot of work is lumped at the start. Then the dividends begin to come in. These raised beds of hand-mixed soil are so easy to weed, cultivate and care for that after a year or two the gardener finds himself well ahead on balance. And the vigor, thrift and bloom of the plants he entrusts to such beds turns out to be a bonus.

This Garden Provides Vegetables For Family of 4 for 4 Months

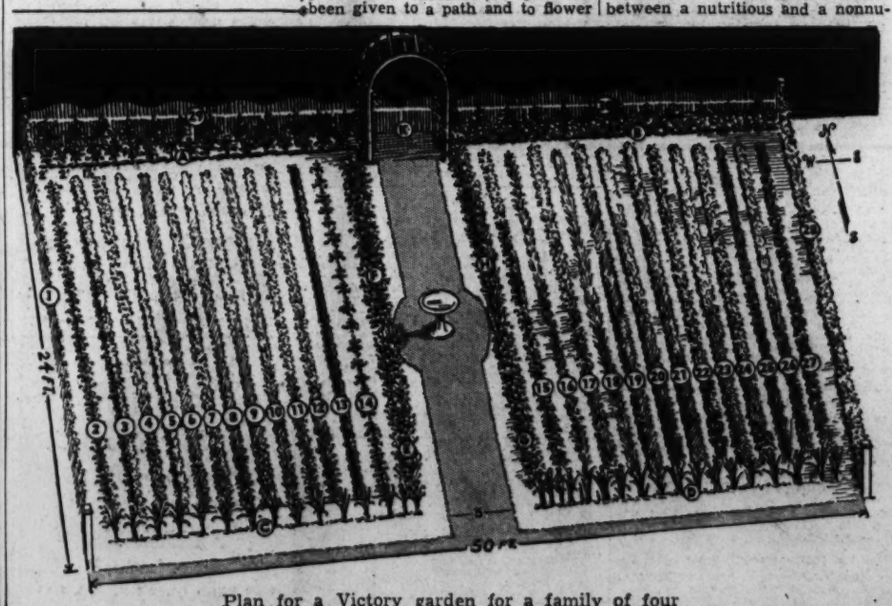
A victory garden planned to provide fresh vegetables for a family of four during a period of four months, is shown in the plan which accompanies this article.

It will occupy a space 24x50 feet, such as is usually available in a back yard in a suburb or outlying city location. Both food and flowers will be grown in this garden, which will be beautiful as well as productive. Much of the space has been given to a path and to flower borders in front and rear, but plenty is left for a long list of nutritious vegetables, rich in vitamins, which will enable the family table to be furnished with an appetizing variety of food.

The list of crops has been made after careful consideration of the family needs and preferences, the probable yield and the nutritional values of the vegetables to be grown. Wherever there has been a choice between a nutritious and a nonnutritous form of a given vegetable, the nutritious form has been chosen. The flowers, to be grown in borders along the path and at the front and rear of the vegetable rows, are both ornamental in the garden and suitable for cutting for use in the house.

Here is the list of flowers and vegetables, each numbered or lettered to indicate its position on the plan.

1 Pole lima beans on fence
2 Cucumbers
3 Wax beans
4 Carrots
5 Green beans
6 Beets
7 Leaf lettuce
8 Parsnips
9 Cos lettuce
10 Spring onions
11 Escarolle (endive)
12 Turnips
13 Parsley
14 Egg plant
15 Peppers
16 Oyster plant (salsify)
17 Green beans
18 Spring onions
19 Peas
20 Chard
21 Peas
22 Celery
23 Collards
24 Kale
25 Broccoli
26 Carrots
27 Italian marrow
28 Pole lima beans on fence
29 Red tomatoes on fence, 12 plants
30 Yellow tomatoes on fence, 12 plants
A Zinnias
B Marigold
C Gladioli
D Gladioli
E Red, white and blue Centaurea
F Salpiglossis
G Red, white and blue Centaurea
H Calliopsis
K On arbor, red, white and blue morning glories



Plan for a Victory garden for a family of four

In the rows where early crops have been planted which may be entirely consumed in time to make succession plantings, the following will be planted as second crops:

3 Beets
4 Green beans
6 Cos lettuce
7 Onion sets
9 Carrots
10 Endive
12 Green beans
17 Onion sets
19 Chinese cabbage
21 Winter radishes
26 Wax beans

This garden is planned to produce a continuous yield throughout the harvest season. Rich feeding and care will combine to produce a heavy yield from small space, and the vegetables so grown will contain maximum nutritive values and excel in tenderness and flavor.

Poultry News

When the chicks arrive check them carefully to see they are in good shape before you accept them at the postoffice or express office. Also check to make sure that the count is correct. Usually most hatcherymen and breeders place a few extra chicks in the box to care for any that are lost en route, and you should check on live chicks to make sure you receive the number you bought alive and in good shape.

Keep the chicks in the boxes on their arrival until you are ready to place them out under the brooders and keep them covered carefully, but do not place them in a hot place nor in a very cold locality, but in the house where they will be comfortable where you are going to brood them later on.

Brooder Space

The general principles of successful artificial brooding are practically the same, no matter how small or how large the brooder may be, whether its capacity be limited to 50 chicks or is sufficiently large to include from 300 to 500. The primary function of the brooder is to supply heat. The ideal brooder supplies the proper degree of temperature, but is so constructed that the chicks can find any degree of coolness or warmth that they desire. This is particularly easy to secure under the colony brooder stoves, as the temperature directly beneath the hover can be sufficiently high to furnish the maximum requirements in heat, while the temperature is greatly reduced as the chicks move away from the hover.

Temperature

The brooder temperature should be from 92 to 95 degrees at the edge of the hover, but the brooder house should be comfortable and not cold. If you have a brooder that does not take the chill off the entire brooder house, then it would be well to provide some supplementary heat for the house, especially if inclined to be drafty. Where you use a coal or oil-burning brooder stove, they usually heat the average sized houses, but there are some types of brooders that it may be necessary to supply with additional heat.

Buy Good Chicks

A few cents more to the chick may mean dollars more profit from the mature birds. Chicks from high-laying strains may lay twice or three times as many eggs as the low-priced chicks. Broiler chicks from stock bred for the purpose may often also prove more than scrub stock. And the chick bought for a soft roaster, capon or market fowl that will weigh from 1 to 5 more pounds when mature may not only bring from 5 to 10 cents more to the pound but the additional weight will make a big difference to the producer when marketed.

Of course, the surplus cockerels sold by many poultrymen may make good birds for broilers and roasters and be made to pay dividends if properly kept; but as a rule it pays to buy better chicks from established poultrymen.

Before the Chicks Arrive

The careful preparation of your brooding equipment is the first step to take in raising your chicks successfully.

Having everything in readiness for the baby chicks requires some planning on the part of the poultryman to anticipate what the baby chicks will need to keep them comfortable, healthy and to satisfy their appetites.

First, your brooder house should be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected from ceiling right down to the floor. It is well to remember that a brooder house is not clean until every bit of dust, dirt and filth has been removed.

A great many poultrymen wash their brooder house with a solution of hot water and lye and while the washing is going on will scrape away old dropping matter with a putty knife. Then, after the scrubbing and scraping is done, will spray the brooder house with some one of the good disinfectant solutions.

The cleaning up of the house should take place three or four days before the chicks arrive. This allows ample time for the house to dry out thoroughly.

Get Equipment Ready Next

Go over the equipment you have left from last year's chicks. Check it carefully for its condition, cleanliness and its ability to handle the number of chicks you have ordered this year.

Here is a list of essential equipment you will need: Water fountains, feeders, thermometers, brooder stove, fuel, disinfectant, feed, litter.

Your successful preparations, before the chicks arrive, will have an important bearing on the number of chicks you raise to sell as broilers or fryers or to keep as pullets in the fall.

So it is important to assemble beforehand the materials and equipment to make the chicks comfortable as soon as they come from the hatchery.

Capital Dahlia Society To Meet Tuesday

The National Capital Dahlia Society will meet Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in the McKendree Church at Twenty-fourth Street and Rhode Island Avenue Northeast. The speaker will be Mrs. Audrey Ames Cook. Mrs. Cook is the daughter of A. A. Ames, prominent dahlia grower of Washington State. Mrs. Cook will speak on the dahlia growers of France and give an account of the dahlia shows held in that country with a special comment on the most prominent French introducer of dahlias, L. Hureau. Mrs. Cook was in France before and during the German occupation and will give an account of the effect of the occupation upon dahlia growers and other horticulturists. The National Capital Dahlia Society invites nonmembers of the society to be its guests for this program.

HEDDA HOPPER

Hollywood, Calif., April 11.—Today a very grown-up young lady named Jane Withers celebrates her sixteenth birthday, and I'm proud to have been invited to the festivities. For seven long years, I've followed Jane's career with a good deal of interest, and an early skepticism has given way to sincere admiration. (I have an aversion for child prodigies, and I still think most children should be seen and not heard.)

Her mother, one of the most intelligent women I've met in this busness, has never made the fatal mistake of trying to isolate her, because she happened to be a star. Consequently, Jane has grown up normally, with regular children for playmates who cheerfully knocked her off her perch whenever she showed signs of sprouting temperament. With consecutive years of stardom, 29 financially successful pictures, and several annual ratings among the top 10 box-office names, Jane, today is one of the nicest, simplest, friendliest girls you'll meet in a month of Sundays, and has no more delusions of grandeur than Mickey Mouse or Donald Duck.

All in all, I think Hollywood's done a pretty good job with its youngsters. Jackie Cooper, whose run of screen success has paralleled Jane's had the same normal growth. Only once, during his long spot-lighting at Metro, did Master Cooper commence to get out of hand. Adult attention was spoiling him, but his mother had the answer to that one. She slapped him into a public school, and the kids of his own age slapped him into shape in no time at all. Judy Garland, Virginia Weidler, Bonita Granville and Mickey Rooney have also survived growing up in the spotlight.

In Mickey's case, there was one very trying period when it looked as if he were developing into a prize brat. This was back in his "Mickey McGuire" days. But Mickey got mixed up in a sand-lot football team about then, and it didn't take the kids with whom he played long to jolt him back to normalcy. One sensible thing about the careers of all these kids has been the normal development of their screen roles. When Jane was nine, she played nine-year-old parts. Today at 16, she plays 16-year-olds. You've seen Jane grow a year every 12 months—instead of the studio's trying to convince you that she was a case of arrested development, forever jelled in the nine-year-mold, acting cute as all get-out long past her childish prime, which always has nauseated adults.

Children who grow normally, who are in constant contact with friends of their own age, who are treated as children and not as stars, are not only able to build and hold stronger fan followings, but show better judgment when the time comes for them to make decisions. The case of Deanna Durbin demonstrates this.

Guarded, coddled, and sheltered both by her parents and her studio, Deanna reached maturity with as little practical experience in living as an inmate of a medieval convent. As a result, she rushed into marriage with her very first beau. Maybe it'll be a happy marriage and a benefit to her career, but there's certainly room for doubt. Kow-towed to, on every childish judgment, by adults who should have known better, it was to be expected that she'd quarrel with her studio the first time her will was crossed. The quarrel has hurt her position seriously, but Deanna's having to learn the hard way. That she'll come out of it with flying colors I have no doubt, but all the unpleasant publicity hasn't done her any good.

Another thing about our Hollywood kids, they've never been allowed to forget that the world is filled with children less fortunate than themselves. They've sacrificed holidays, playing countless benefits at orthopedic hospitals, orphanages, and Christmas celebrations for the underprivileged. Jane's toys, since she was tiny, have been rigidly rationed. Of the carloads of presents received at Christmas and at birthdays, she was required to make a careful and modest selection. The rest were given away to various charitable institutions, and there was no backing down, once her choice was made. Due to the natural greediness of any small child, that's a hard lesson to learn. But Jane learned it, and it's developed an understanding and generosity in her nature that's as much a part of her as her friendliness.

So I'm looking forward to the party today; 'cause I know that those famous kids who'll be kicking up their heels in youthful exumberance are a regular, likeable bunch of youngsters. Hollywood's had plenty of the other kind (too numerous to mention here), but no matter how determined their mamas were to railroad them to the top (and mamas—better not get me started on that!), they haven't stayed in the race; for nothing gets over more quickly to an audience than the "phoneyness" of an affected child.

LOUELLA PARSONS—Raymond Massey Likes Ham-Acting

Hollywood, April 11. — If you call Raymond Massey a "ham" he will thank you. He believes being a ham is praise fit for Caesar and any actor who isn't one shouldn't be on the stage or screen.

"There is entirely too much underplaying today," Massey told me. "The stage and screen should be a place of illusion. Why should actors try to be themselves when they are offering their conception of another person's character and personality?"

We had been talking about John Barrymore, for whom Massey has terrific admiration.

Massey, who once played a modern version of "Hamlet," says John is best of all the thousands of Hamlets who have trod the board in this famous Shakesperean role. John had recently passed an evening with Massey and recited the entire play with all the gestures.

It was I who had intimated that some writers had dubbed Jawn a "ham" and Massey quickly replied:

"Thank God for "hams!" unless an actor can be one he shouldn't try to act."

Humor lights up Massey's expressive face when he talks and it's easy to understand why he has endeared himself to the movie-going public. I have been a Massey fan for a long time and after seeing "The Invaders" I wanted to meet him. So he came to my house.

Interesting that the bit he plays in "The Invaders" is the only interior ever made in Canada. The other interiors were made in England and it's amazing, he said, that Michael Powell has done such a magnificent job when you consider the picture was filmed partly in England and partly in Canada.

Canadian-born Massey was on his home ground when he played his bit in "The Invaders." He was born in Toronto. Yet he is as American as ham and eggs (pardon that ham again). His mother was American and his ancestry dates to Plymouth Rock days. His brother, Vincent, is in the Canadian ministry and a very big man in Canada's political affairs.

The career of the acting Massey is highlighted by the years he spent with the Canadian army in France, during the first World War. It was while stationed in Siberia after World War No. 1 he decided to become an actor. He put on plays to pass the time and eventually went to Oxford to study drama.

"Is 'Abe Lincoln in Illinois' your favorite play?" I asked him.

"I played it so long, first on Broadway, and then in the movies, that I thought I would probably remain Lincoln to the end of the chapter. As much as I enjoyed Bob Sherwood's play, I was glad to do something else.

"A far cry," he went on, "from Lincoln to Capt. John Brown in 'Santa Fe Trail.' But I thoroughly enjoyed playing John Brown. Mike Curtiz, the director, used to call me 'the Broadway Bum,' which, you will admit, was no way to treat Abraham Lincoln."

Massey laughed at the memory. "You know Mike always called John Brown, Joe Brown, and he really had such a fondness for the fanatical captain that although he was meant to be a heavy, Mike made him a very sympathetic character."

"Isn't Mike wonderful the way he twists the King's English?" I said laughing, with Massey, who seems to have fun out of life.

"Yes, but a very good director," he emphasized.

Massey, under contract to Warners, is spending his two weeks vacation in New York where his son, now with the R. C. A. F., has joined him.

LEONARD LYONS

New York, April 11.

The story is being told of a Nazi official who, in 1937, tried to dissuade his younger, democratic brother from migrating to America. "Stay here, and join the German army," the Nazi advised. "You can make a great career in the army." The young man insisted, nevertheless, that America offered greater opportunity. "How much could I make as a captain?" he asked. . . . "Forty dollars a week," said the Nazi. "And as a major in our army you can make $55. As a colonel, $75. As a general, you can make as high as $100 a week. And as a field marshal you can make $150 a week. So you see what Germany might offer you—$150 a week as a field marshal" . . . "I don't want to be a field marshal," said the young man, packing his bags for America. "I rather be a Marshall Field."

In the apartment of Stanton Griffis, the Paramount official, is a frame containing two pictures. The first was taken at Cornell, and shows Griffis standing beside another undergrad named Noyes. Both were working their way through college by publishing the college newspaper. The second photo is of the same two men, standing in the same position. It was taken 30 years later, in the office of the stock exchange firm of Hemphill, Noyes & Co. Griffis is one of Noyes' partners in that firm . . . A few days ago a friend commented on those photos. "Yes, they are rather unusual," Griffis agreed. "It could happen only in business—never in marriage."

In his Madison Avenue studio Alfred Stieglitz, one of America's pioneer photographers, still experiments with cameras. And one of his fondest recollections is of his ill-fated attempt to induce George Bernard Shaw to express, in a statement which would be listened to throughout the world, the vast possibilities of photography . . . Stieglitz was in Paris then, and learned that Shaw was interested in the camera. He wrote to London for an appointment. Shaw invited him to come and plead his case . . . The cameraman booked passage on the Channel boat. But, in crossing the North Sea, he caught cold and lost his voice. He therefore remained on the vessel for the return voyage to France, and never saw G. B. Shaw.

Edwin MacArthur, Kirsten Flagstad's conductor, has been reengaged as musical director for the Columbia Festival in South Carolina . . . Last week, at the orchestra rehearsal, he stood next to the first violinist and told the entire violin section: "On the next phrase you all come in pianissimo." Only the first violinist obeyed this order. The Denver-born conductor banged his baton against the music stand and asked why he wasn't being obeyed. "But, maestro," one of them explained, pointing to the first violinist, "we thought you-all meant only him."

Ferenc Molnar, the Hungarian playwright, vows that this happened when he visited Einstein at Princeton . . . The scientist entertained his guest with some violin solos. He played heavy Bach passages . . . Molnar smiled, chuckled and then laughed loudly. Einstein stopped playing. "Mr. Molnar," the aggrieved man protested, "when I go to your plays I don't laugh."

The other night Paul Robeson, Lillian Hellman and Mrs. Maxim Litvinoff came to Cafe Society Uptown. In honor of the Ambassador's wife, but without mentioning her presence, each entertainer played or sang a Russian tune. Kenneth Spence sang "Troika," Eddie South played a medley of Russian songs and Hazel Scott played "Dark Eyes." Band Leader Joe Sullivan then announced, "I'm going to dedicate my next song to a famous person who is with us tonight. I'd like you all to meet that person—Joe Helboch" . . . Helboch once owned the Onyx Club, where swing was born. Recently he's been a bartender at Ben Marden's Riviera . . . Hazel Scott later met Mrs. Litvinoff, and said: "I played that Russian folk song, 'Dark Eyes,' for you" . . . "That's a Czarist, not a folk song," corrected Mrs. Litvinoff. "That's why Lenin started the revolution."

The Federal Communications Commission, which exposed Germany's phony American radio station "D-E-B-U-N-K," now knows the exact spot in Germany where that station is located . . . The USO's clubhouse in Temple Emanuel offers a free phone call or cablegram home as a bingo prize to soldiers and sailors. Last week's winner, Robert Forsythe, who cabled to his family in Scotland, left New York before the reply arrived. That message from home now is waiting for him at the clubhouse . . . The War, Navy, State and Immigration Departments are collaborating on the plan to put all interned enemy aliens to work.

The New York Theaters

By Richard Watts, Jr.

New York, April 11.

It appears that they are having a controversy in Hollywood which applies with equal appropriateness to the American theater. What is the proper propagandist attitude for our writers to take toward the enemies of our country and of democratic civilization? One school of thought holds that the Nazis and the Japanese should be mocked scornfully as ridiculous clowns. It is the contention of the other that they should be portrayed as the sinister, menacing and terribly powerful people that they obviously are.

Since my own feelings are on the side of the latter viewpoint, it is but fair for me to express the attitude of the former group at some length. According to its spokesmen, we should remember that it is the greatest desire of the totalitarians to make us think that they are both monstrous and invincible. To strike terror into the souls of their potential victims means the accomplishment of half of their design, and one of their most successful feats of propaganda has been the showing of the official war films portraying the devastation wrought by their armed forces.

Therefore, say the advocates of the use of scorn as a weapon, it is but playing into the hands of our enemies to show them in our plays and our motion pictures as the baleful and ominous monsters they want the world to think them. Let us but spread the realization throughout the land that they are not triumphant conquerors, but foolish, fatuous clowns posing as supermen and the spell of their string of early successes will be broken. Let us not be overawed by a myth of invincibility.

Satire, these gentlemen say has always been one of the greatest of our weapons, since the American sense of humor is a triumphant and wonderful force. No people can be beaten who can laugh scornfully at what they hate, and if we are wise enough to mock the Germans and the Japanese instead of being impressed by them, our victory is assured. It is a sign of our coming triumph that in a motion picture called "To Be or Not to Be," Lubitsch should make fun of the Nazis amid the ruins of ravaged Warsaw or that a New York revue should show Hitler as a comic homosexual.

Sense of Humor Overrated

It all goes back to a characteristic national trait of overrating the sense of humor. Just as it is the greatest insult that can be offered to any American to say that he lacks that sense, so is it an equal affront to say that humor will not conquer all. Since one of the chief assets of Hitler's early rise to power was the belief of his opponents that he was comic and could be laughed into oblivion, you might thing that such a viewpoint had been effectually overturned, but apparently it hasn't.

The value of the sense of humor is undeniable. It can be a delightful social trait, and it is certainly one of the qualities that, for example, make the Chinese so enchanting a people. It can be wonderful when it enables the tortured Poles to sneer at their conquerors or the Norwegians to deride their occupying Nazi forces. When, however, it strives to become a substitute for bitter, implacable hatred and an accurate judgment of the foe's power, it emerges as a menace rather than a help. The French, too, once thought that their gift for satiric humor was a weapon against Hitler.

The Japanese used to seem pretty humorous, also. In Hongkong last fall we had a lot of fun about the well-known Japanese spy who was the head barber at the Hongkong Hotel, and in June the walls of the Harmonie Club in lovely Batavia shook from the hearty laughter of the tough Dutch burghers there about the way the foolish Japanese trade delegation had been so amusingly thwarted, even though the Dutch are essentially a grimly realistic people. Only in bombed Chungking did not one seem to think the Nipponese were very comic.

The chief result of that sense of humor about Germany was to make us overlook the menace of Hitler while he was rising to power and as he prepared to become the world's overlord. In respect to Japan, it made us feel that the Nippon espionage system was something to laugh at and that the grim, heroic resistance of the Chinese to enemy aggression was the result of Jap futility rather than of Chinese valor. I know because, heaven help me, I tended to share that latter belief myself.

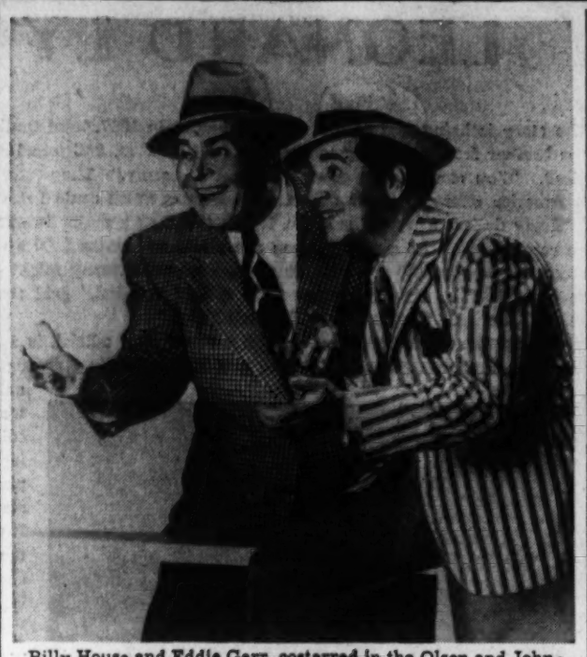
Not Fighting Comic Fellows

As for the belief that a proper use of the weapon of humor will keep us from cowering before the myth of the Nazi superman, such an idea is based on another strange illusion. The superb Russian resistance to the rush of the German machine and the subsequent successful counter-attack, together with the gallant stand of Gen. Mihailovich's Serbs in the mountains of Jugoslavia, have already destroyed any such myth, just as the Chinese have wrecked any similar idea concerning the Japanese. What we have to fight now is not a myth. It is the real thing.

It has, from time to time, served the purpose of the Germans to make other nations feel that their ruthless savagery was irresistible. In the case of the United States, though, it is to the advantage of the enemy to weaken our determination by hinting that victory over him might be simple. The totalitarians at least pay us the compliment of knowing that we are not likely to be frightened by them. What would please them would be for us to take our foes so lightly that we would remain characteristically easygoing and take victory for granted.

For it is obvious that, while Germany and Japan cannot beat us, we could manage to beat ourselves, provided we remained smug and self-satisfied. All the evidence is that we are getting over these unpleasant traits and are preparing to face our enemies with the realization that they are dangerous, powerful and terribly resourceful. They are not going to strike any awe into us, but even that would be better than to take them lightly as comic fellows who could be laughed out of existence.

The attitude of literature and the drama toward the enemy becomes particularly significant now that John Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down" has opened. Next week, in a discussion of the new play, it will be possible to go into this important matter in more detail. The foregoing notes are merely a few generalities preliminary to that more thorough contemplation. Here assuredly is a matter that deserves the most careful thought, since the national psychology in such a time is so all-important and the theater can be so vital in its contribution to it.



Billy House and Eddie Garr, costarred in the Olsen and Johnson roles in the original stage version of "Hellzapoppin," which opens a fortnight's return engagement in the National Theater tomorrow night. The same cast that appeared on the same stage for two weeks earlier in the season returns on this visit of the magnified madhouse

Strates Shows Hit the Peak Of Carnival Fun

Picture in your mind's eye—if you can—the spectacle of a man executing intricate feats of balancing on top of a slender 85-foot perch!

If you can do this, you will have a mental picture of what you will see on the best illuminated midway in America at the big James E. Strates Shows, now playing a 10-day engagement on the Nineteenth and G Streets, Northeast, grounds.

And, just for an added thrill, Francesco Albanis, wonder boy of the Four Albanis, South American balancing foursome, will actually ride a motorcycle around a narrow stretch of track suspended at dizzy heights, without a protecting net. We ask you—is this a breath-taker.

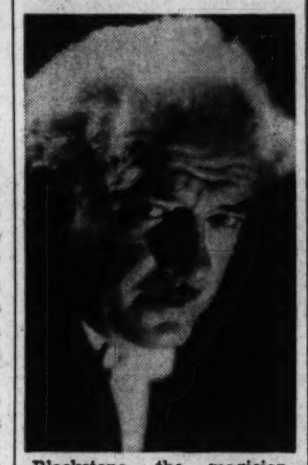
This immaculately clean amusement organization is sponsored by National Defense Post, No. 9, and if you are a lover of thrill rides you will find 20 of the newest models.

Other Midway attractions include Toy Town, Jungleland, Harlem Follies, Oddities of 1942, the French Casino, Vanities and 15 others, not overlooking the big Monkey Show, featuring the widely publicized Garto, the man-sized gorilla.

Seven Diesel plants are required to furnish the electricity for the "World's best and most beautiful of all midways." Wednesdays and Saturdays are designated as children's days, when children can purchase a ticket for any ride or show on the Midway for half price —5 cents.



Blackstone, the magician, who will occupy the stage at the Earle Theater with a company of 30, for the week beginning Friday

Stanley Ridges and Carole Lombard, as they appear in Ernst Lubitsch's production of "To Be or Not to Be," a mad satire on the Nazi occupation of Poland, reopening on F Street Thursday at Loew's Columbia Theater, following its successful run at the Palace. Jack Benny costars

Mickey Rooney, who created the character on the screen, as he is seen in one of the amusing sequences in "The Courtship of Andy Hardy," now in its second laugh-week at Loew's Palace Theater. Cecilia Parker returns to join the rest of the Hardy family in this ebullient subject

Glen Echo Park Opens With Week of Hilarious Fun

Yesterday marked the anniversary of one week of fun at Glen Echo Park in 1942. But the opening, one week ago, marked the thirty-second annual opening of this great forty-acre amusement center. Beautiful weather has added to the carnival spirit of gayety entered into with gusto by the thousands of parents, young couples, children and soldiers and sailors on leave for much needed relaxation.

At the beautiful Spanish Garden Ballroom, Maestro Paul Kain has held sway as unchallenged "King" of the swing set. His talented crew of 12, including a newcomer, glamorous Iris O'Brien, are again making jitterbug history. This is the third successive season of the Kain brand of music at the Spanish Garden. Every week night, from 9 'til midnight will find the elite of the swingsters gathered at this beautiful ballroom, large enough to hold comfortably over 3000 twirling dancers.

Nine Thrilling Rides

Of the nine great thrill rides, the most popular is the Coaster Dips. However, rapidly increasing in popularity is the relatively new Flying Scooter. This flying contraption is operated by the rider, much like an aeroplane.

The comfortable picnic groves which can easily accomodate 1800 picknickers are already booked by fraternal groups, clubs, and church societies, for parties and picnics of all sizes and kinds. It has been an annual custom of hundreds of such societies, for many years, to picnic at Glen Echo.

Other features to be enjoyed at this park, are Whip, Waterway Canal, Dodem Cars, Carousel, Spook House, game concessions, etc. Of special interest are the two fine cafes. One is the Roof Garden Cafe, with a broad view of the entire 40 acres of fun; the other the supermagnificent Concourse Cafe on the ground level.

Admission is free and there is plenty of free parking space.

Marrying Minister— He's Wed 400 on Film

Hollywood, (Wide World).—The Rev. Neal Dood is a specialist. The Pastor of St. Mary's of the Angels is the movies' "marryin' parson."

Dr. Dood read the familiar Episcopal service the other day to Roger Clark and Helen Parrish in "He Kissed the Bride." It was his 400th film ceremony. He started back in the days of silent films.

He recalls the somewhat embarrassing experience of marrying, on the screen, a couple who had been divorced not long before in real life.

He was a little glum as he said:

"The percentage of divorces resulting from screen weddings is far less than those in real life. That may be because most marriages come at the end of the picture."

Movie Rail Coach Goes Nowhere

Hollywood, (Wide World).—Movieland's most traveled railway coach actually moves only a few feet a year over what must be the world's shortest railroad.

Actually, it never leaves its station, never gets out from under its own special roof, yet it has withstood all kinds of weather and vicariously has rolled through virtually every country on the globe.

Located at Warners, it is a real coach, with real steel wheels on standard axles. And in it one may fancy he still can faintly smell the characteristic odors of orange peel and bananas that are a carry-through from the days it was on the regular coastal run between Los Angeles and San Francisco.

For each of its films, it has been repainted and renamed for many railroads. The only regrettable thing about it is that it never gets a chance to get out and really roll.

'Hellzapoppin,' Especially When the Ghost Walks!

Stage Revue, Back at National, Belittles Its Screen Version, as Two New Films Aid In the Destruction of an Ancient Taboo

By Nelson B. Bell

IT IS TRUE, of course, in a strictly literal sense—just as the verbal tricksters who contrive the advertising catchlines for the living version of the piece so gloatingly proclaim—that "You haven't seen 'Hellzapoppin' until you've seen it on the stage."

By its omissions, more eloquently than by what it included, the celluloid edition of the Olsen and Johnson gaucherie tacitly admitted its inability to transfer to the screen the essential qualities that have made this uniquely unconventional and contagiously rowdy revue the most bewilderingly sensational hit of recent years in the American theater.

Certainly in its content and treatment the film was sufficiently fantastic in its flippancy, foolishness and velocity to match the original as a lunatic exhibit of thoroughgoing insanity. Viewed objectively, dispassionately and without the odium of comparison, the picture was as adventurous a self-contained departure from the conventions of the cinema as the Broadway production had been from those of the stage incarnate. To this column it seemed such an extravagantly ridiculous denial of all accepted theories of what can and cannot be photographed and recorded that no other title than "Hellzapoppin" could possibly have identified it so immediately as the revolutionary experiment in comedy technique that it was.

But with all its perhaps overvaunted scope and flexibility, the two-dimensional silver sheet still was not elastic enough to reach out and embrace the audience as the integral and indispensable factor in the merry madness necessary to place it on an equality with the three-dimensional stage. "Hellzapoppin," to be "Hellzapoppin," not only must occupy the stage, but must romp across the footlights and penetrate to the farthest corners of the orchestra, boxes, balcony, gallery and even the lobby of the theater. This "audience participation" is a little matter of the touch of the hand, a wink of the eye and a "Boops-a-Daisy," danced in the aisles by cast and customers, that the motion picture, as yet, has not quite been able to negotiate.

Which, obviously, is why the crafty Messrs. Olsen and Johnson have forgotten all about their picture and are anchoring Billy House, Eddie Garr and their companion clowns in the National Theater for their second fortnight of the season, beginning tomorrow night.

Twice-Told Tales Sometimes Seem Strangely New

THE CONSPICUOUS POINTS OF VARIANCE between the diametrically opposed stage and screen—with their respective advantages and disadvantages—however, are no more astonishing than the variations either is able to work on a single theme. On the stage, within recent memory, "Susanna and the Elders" and "Out West It's Different" were identical stories told in such contrasting terms as to seem entirely different. The same was true of "You Belong to Me" and "Appointment for Love," on the screen.

The point is exemplified again in Washington's current motion picture week with the simultaneous showings of "All That Money Can Buy" and "The Remarkable Andrew." Each employs the same basic formula by different means and for opposite purposes. Both are composites of the mundane and the supernatural; of realism and fantasy. With so much in common, it is the more amazing that the two pictures should leave imprints on memory so little alike. They wield the same tools on wholly different designs.

To strengthen its dramatic fiber and point a moral lesson, "All That Money Can Buy," the memorable celluloid translation of Stephen Vincent Benet's "The Devil and Daniel Webster," brings back from the grave the most reprehensible rogues in history, led by the renegade Benedict Arnold. To sharpen its humor and lend quaint zest to its comedy, "The Remarkable Andrew," on the other hand, introduces the shades of the most honored and profoundly revered of American heroes, with the more worthy reason for their presence in large measure submerged. George Washington and Benjamin Franklin become comedians, while Benedict Arnold and his crew pose as remorseful and repentant villains!

The films are identical twins only in sharing one admirable purpose. They share the towering virtue of resurrecting these illustrious figures of the past to lend mighty impact to powerful pleas for the preservation of the precious human freedoms written into the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, the Bill of Rights, the Emancipation Proclamation and the hearts of all righteous and upright men.

The simple dignity and sublime faith with which Edward Arnold, as Daniel Webster, and William Holden, as Andrew Jackson Long, recount these fundamentals of American democracy is rich compensation for a visit to the theater.

The Celluloids Should Have Heeded Mr. Shakespeare

THE UNSPOKEN AND INCOMPREHENSIBLE TABOO against the supernatural on the screen, so long prevalent among even the most sapient of the motion picture producers, is gradually composing itself into further testimony that dramatic works cannot judiciously be condemned by categories, classifications or blanket indictments. Such baseless prejudice for many years operated to the huge discredit of "Oriental" and "costume" pictures and was only upset by an unexpected succession of splendid films in both designations.

A similar process of extenuation now seems to be running in favor of screenplays in which ghostly principals, brought back from life after death, share honors with living characters of the present. The public may pay its debt of gratitude to such impressive examples of sound drama as "Our Town," "On Borrowed Time," "Outward Bound," "Here Comes Mr. Jordan" and other latter-day releases of comparable worth, including the two above cited. This emancipation has been a little tardy in overtaking the cinema.

The gelatins might long since have shared the living theater's freedom from such dreary premonitions by remembering that a certain Mr. Will Shakespeare, something over three centuries ago, did fairly well with his apparitions in such minor items of dramatic literature as a couple of plays called "Hamlet" and "Macbeth."

Michele Morgan, the brilliant young French actress, who will be seen as costar with Paul Henreid in the RKO-Radio production of "Joan of Paris," scheduled as the next screen attraction at RKO-Keith's Theater. The story is of fugitive R. A. F. fliers trapped in Nazi Paris and rescued by the young woman of the title, who is Miss Morgan, of course

Vaudeville Renaissance Is in the Air

By John Ferris

New York, April 11 (Wide World).—Vaudeville, the chief form of stage entertainment for millions of Americans before the movies and the radio got the upper hand, appears to be edging back into public favor.

Jugglers and hoofers, acrobats and song-and-patter men, comedians and magicians, monologists, impersonators and people with trained dogs are beginning to clamor at the doors of booking offices as the good news spreads.

Some of these acts are already appearing in cafes, beer gardens and small halls throughout the country. Others are making one-night or one-week stands in theaters.

Several weeks ago, Clifford C. Fischer, by arrangement with the Shuberts, presented a new variety show on Broadway, "Priorities of 1942," starring Lou Holtz, Willie Howard, Phil Baker and Paul Draper, supported by the Reynolds skaters, Joan Merrill, Hazel Scott, the Nonchalants, Gene Sheldon, the Barrys, Masters and Rollins, Diane Denise, Lari and Conchita and Beverly Lane, with a chorus of Midge Field's "Twenty-four Versailles Beauties."

"It has often been said, and it sounds like a cliche, but nevertheless it is true, that all the great stars of the stage and screen have graduated from the two-a-day and that there is no training ground for new talent," Fischer said.

"The theater now feels the dearth of star material. If this engagement proves successful I will immediately introduce this policy throughout the country. I am going to try to uncover new talent. Vaudeville was a wonderful reservoir for new people and I hope it can regain its rightful place in the theater."

Gerald Griffin, national executive secretary of the American Guild of Variety Artists, an A. F. of L. union which claims 20,000 members, is likewise confident that happy days are ahead for troupers of ability. Griffin said there were possibly another 20,000 persons playing through the South and Southwest who are not members of the union.

"People are getting sick of double features in the movies," Griffin declared. "And the church people resent many of the screen situations. Churches here in New York and in other cities and towns have never quite abandoned vaudeville and have continued to put on shows in their parish halls.

"The Army camps are helping, too. Boys who never saw a live show before see one put on now by the USO and ask for more. Also they write home about the shows and stir up interest in them.

"Vaudeville or variety came originally from the old beer gardens and music halls and a good deal of what looks like a revival is taking place in that kind of hall right now."

"Griffin said actually there are more places to play today than before the vaudeville of the '20's started to go into a comatose state.

"There are booking agents now in places like Rochester, N. Y., Altoona, Pa., Youngstown and Akron, Ohio," he continued. "Can you imagine towns like that booking acts in the old days? There are booking offices also in Peoria, Springfield and Rockford, Ill., and in Milwaukee.

"The old vaudeville was a little boisterous. It had to be. But it was clean. It was well timed, with plenty of novelty and variety."

Griffin said the USO had developed a large pool of talent from which to draw for new bookings and that many of the acts were being sent into towns which have boomed since war work began. He cited Passaic, N. J., as an example.

"A theater there puts on a 1:30 a. m. matinee. The workers have time to slip home and get cleaned up before they come back to see the show. The same thing is being done in many other towns."

Melvyn Douglas and Norma Shearer, in the costellar roles of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer production of "We Were Dancing," to be presented as chief screen feature of the bill for the week beginning Thursday at Loew's Capitol Theater. Adapted from Noel Coward's "Tonight at 8:30."

Hollywood, A City Of Crackpots

By Franklin Arthur

Hollywood (Wide World).—Hollywood, so some people say, is a city of crackpots, doing crackpot things.

Actually, it isn't true. It's populated by people just as intelligent, just as hard working as in Topeka, Toledo or Tampa.

But Hollywood has done its part to make the legend true. And what sets the town apart is the colossal way in which it goes crackpot, when it does. The biggest of its overworked adjectives are hardly adequate on such occasions.

Herewith a few of the more classic examples of things Hollywood would prefer to forget:

The one about the foreign director who demanded a camera crane of unbelievable size, finally throwing such a tantrum that the studio built him one. Only then was it found that the sound stage didn't exist with doors big enough to admit it. The answer? A new sound stage, biggest in town.

• • • •

A fire broke out on a studio backlot. Firemen arrived noisily, waved aside a gesticulating property man while they attached a hose to a hydrant. Then they realized what the prop man was trying to say. It was a dummy hydrant, used in a movie scene. Flames, meanwhile, crackled merrily.

• • • •

A studio decided to duplicate a famous boat. Laboriously, with minute attention to detail, it was put together inside the studio shop. But the detail department had overlooked one thing: How to get it outside and onto the backlot lake. Knocking out the side of the shop wall solved that one.

• • • •

A playful star and a gun-shy prop man figured in a classic. For a war picture, a big fort was erected on a ranch. Explosives were carefully planted, to be detonated at the sound of a pistol shot. The star, knowing the prop man's weakness, found him dozing in the shade, pulled a trigger on a pistol blank beside his ear. The dynamite crew, thinking it was their signal, sent the entire set skyward. It took a week to restore it; six months to restore the prop man's nerves.

• • • •

A passion for authenticity demanded importation of a South African hippo for a jungle picture. None of the zoo products would do. The beast was captured, shipped here at great cost. Hundreds of dollars more were spent building him a pen at a tiny inlet in Los Angeles harbor. The hippo was slipped into his haven, but promptly curled up his toes and died. Only then did the studio learn that hippos can't survive in salt water.

• • • •

The publicity drums beat loudly for a foreign star, signed via cable by a big shot producer who thought him terrific. Fanfare marked his coming, but the big noise was saved for a lavish press party to mark his arrival. That was when the studio learned the sad news. Its prize didn't speak a word of English.

• • • •

Showplace of the town was a studio's new administration building. Executives pointed with pride. It was the day after its occupation that the absence of a back door was discovered. For weeks, until the oversight was remedied, bus boys carried garbage from the dining room down the polished halls, past the executives' offices and out the front door.

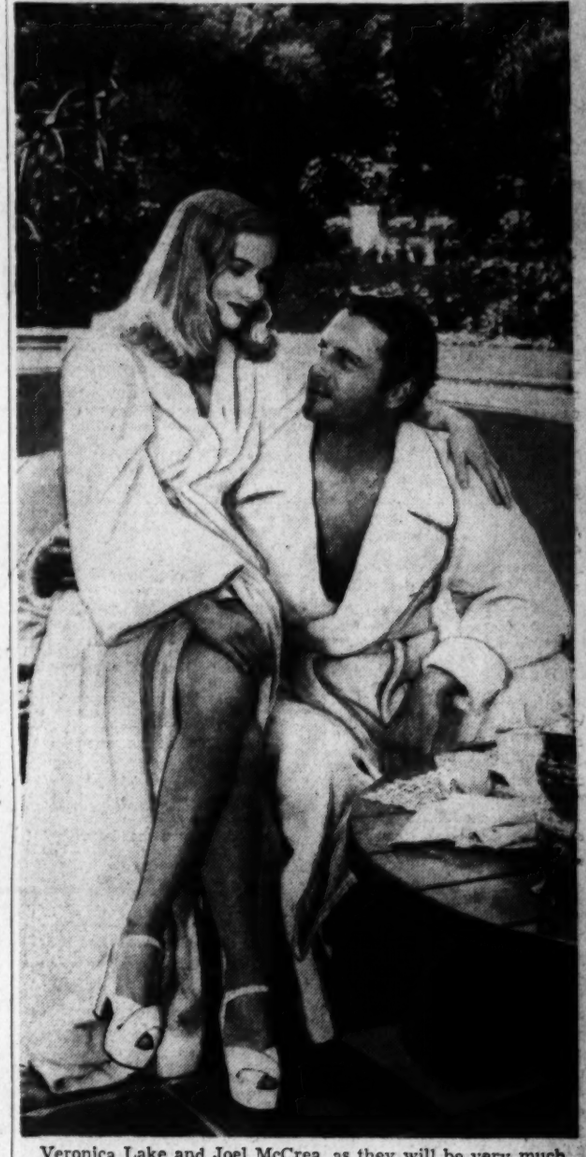
• • • •

A department head was noted for signing expense vouchers without checking them. As a gag, one of his hirelings put one through for an even million dollars. Blithely the D. H. signed it. The resultant explosion just missed lopping off a few heads.

• • • •

Then there was the case of a strange sneak preview. At sneaks, sound and picture are on separate film tracks. The projectionist picked up the first reel picture track, the seventh reel of sound. A trademark lion's mouth opened. Everyone waited for the rear. But out came, in a piping, child-like voice:

"You can't do that to me!"



Veronica Lake and Joel McCrea, as they will be very much seen in the principal roles in Preston Sturges' Paramount production of "Sullivan's Travels," opening Friday as chief feature for the new week at the Earle Theater. A strong supporting cast fills the many lesser roles.

Olivia de Havilland and Henry Fonda, as the professorial worm that turned and his sprightly wife, inversely, in the Warner Brothers picturization of the comedy stage hit, "The Male Animal." After a successful week at the Earle, this frolic reopens Friday at the Metropolitan

The Brighter Side

Empty Toothpaste Tubes

By Damon Runyon

Mr. Joe Turp Writes:

Brooklyn, N. Y., April 10.

Dear sir the other night I was reading the paper and I ses to my wife hay Brighteyes if our toothpaste runs out you will have to take the empty tube to the drug store and give it to Mister Green the drug store guy before you can get any more. I ses remember now and don't throw away no empty tubes. I ses it's on account of the war.

Ethel ses all right Joe. I'll remember. But how is Mister Green going to fill an old empty tube especially after it has been rolled up tight from the bottom the way you do them when you are pushing out the toothpaste? I ses he will let you buy a brand new tube of paste after you give him the empty one. She ses what will he allow me on it?

I ses Ethel he won't allow you nothing on it. I ses he just lets you buy a new tube after you give him the empty one to prove that we need more toothpaste. I ses it's a Government saving proposition and Ethel ses why that's strange. I know the Government is trying to save everything but why does it want to save toothpaste? Is it for the soldiers teeth Joe?

I ses look Ethel, I ses the Government is not interested in the toothpaste but in the tubes that it comes in. I ses the material the tubes is made out of is very valuable for war work and that's why the Government doesn't want any more of it used up in the tubes than is absolutely necessary. Ethel ses O I see. Now isn't that just Abbie Schulzes luck?

I ses what do you mean lovely? Ethel ses she doesn't use toothpaste. She uses salt. I tried it once but it made me too thirsty all the time. Well Joe I'll watch the empty tubes but if you will be a little less wasteful of the toothpaste we will not need a new tube very often. You know Joe you don't have to squeeze a great big gob of toothpaste out of the tube every time you brush your teeth. A very little will be just as good.

I ses Ethel I don't think I need you to tell me how to brush my teeth. I ses I use only as much toothpaste as I need on the brush and she ses well then you always need a big gob Joe. Sometimes I wonder if you are painting the house with that toothpaste because you use so much of it and you never just push it out gently. You give the tube a terrible squeeze every time. Sometimes you squeeze it so hard that the toothpaste comes out of the hind end instead of the front.

I ses well sometimes I am in a big hurry and want the paste to come out fast and anyway I have always told you that you ought to always get a tube for each one of us and not just one for the two of us. Ethel ses why we both use the same kind and it would have been wasteful to get two tubes at once. My moms always told me to save on little things and besides my conscience don't hurt me now for using up stuff the Government needs for the war. Are you mad because of what I ses about using so much paste Joe?

I ses of course not beautiful but I was just thinking that we will be in tough luck if the Government ses we have to show the drug store fellow the empty tube with the top screwed on it before we can get a new one. Ethel ses why? Are they saving the tops, too? I ses no but in all the time I have been married to you I have never seen a tube of toothpaste in this house with the top on it after you used it once. I ses I have never even been able to find the top afterwards and maybe the reason I have to squeeze the tube so hard is because the paste gets stiff without a top and won't come out easy.

Ethel ses are you insinuating that I am careless about those tops Joe Turp? I ses no but I am wondering if you have been hiding them all these years. I ses if you have you ought to have a load of them now. Ethel ses now I wish I had been wasteful and always bought two tubes at a time and then if I lost an old top I wouldn't hear criticism about it. Joe you don't really think Mister Green will want to see the top do you?

I ses no I guess not sweets and she ses I'm glad because we need some new toothpaste right now and I can't remember where I put the top of the old tube.

Yours truly,
JOE TURP.

Confident Symphony Plans Ahead

While the annual campaign to raise the sustaining fund for the National Symphony Orchestra will not begin until Wednesday, the management has announced that plans are formulated for the 1942-1943 season in full confidence that the necessary financial support will be forthcoming. Not only has an agreement been reached with the Musicians' Protective Union that will permit a six-weeks summer season of three concerts a week at the Potomac Watergate (the budget for which is included in the sustaining fund of $114,000), but soloists have also been engaged for the winter season in Constitution Hall. Dr. Hans Kindler has almost completed the entire list of assisting artists.

Six of the 13 soloists thus far engaged are native Americans, and two of these are newcomers to the concert field who have made remarkable debuts within the past two years, and will be heard here for the first time. The native contingent consists of Astrid Varnay, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera; Carroll Glenn, violinist, who went on from winning last year one young artist's award of the National Federation of Music Clubs to appearances with major orchestras; Albert Spalding, violinist; Frances Nash, Washington's own pianist; James Melton, tenor; and Evelyn Swarthout, pianist. Also to be heard at one of the Sunday concerts is the young Brazilian pianist, who wins this year's Guiomar Novaes award.

No small interest attaches to the local debut of Astrid Varney, the 23-year-old soprano, who made an unannounced and successful debut in the Metropolitan Opera House last December.

Three American composers—Giuseppe Ferrata, Felix Borovski and Ralph Kibler—will be featured by D. Sterling Wheelwright at his community musicale organ recital tomorrow night in Washington Chapel of Latter-Day Saints. Grieg's "To Spring" has been featured for Wednesday night on the program of music for meditation. Edna C. Wheelwright, soprano, will assist Saturday night with Amy Worth's "Midsummer," Beatrice Fenner's "When Children Pray" and Stefano Donaudy's "O Vanished Loveliness."

Marvin Gardner, former baritone soloist in St. Thomas' Church and now in the armed service, was soloist on Good Friday in a performace of Harold Moore's cantata, "The Darkest Hour," by the choir of Christ Church Fitchburg, Mass., under the direction of Paul Aiken.

Sponsored by the local chapter of the American Guild of Organists, three organ recitals will be given in Washington Chapel of Latter-Day Saints on April 20, 22 and 25. The organists are Robert Ruckman and John Slater Appel, of this city, and C. Griffith Bratt, of Baltimore. On April 29 Virgil Fox, of Baltimore, will give a recital in Washington Cathedral.

Under the direction of Carl Hjortsvang, the Evansville College a cappella choir will present a program at 8 o'clock tonight in Foundry Methodist Church. The choir of 37 voices is also singing today in the morning chapel service at Fort Myer. On a spring tour sponsored by the Evansville (Ind.) Post of Veterans of Foreign Wars, the choir includes in its itinerary appearances at Forts Myer, Dix, Monmouth, Hamilton and Hayes, and Indiantown Gap Military Reservation.

A concert of recorded music will be given tomorrow at 7:30 p. m. in Southwest Branch Public Library, Seventh and H Streets. The program includes Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," No. 1; selections from "Rigoletto," Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Borodin's "Polovetski Dances" and music by George Gershwin. In the Northeast Branch Public Library, Maryland Avenue and Seventh Street, a recorded program of Easter music will be given Friday at 7:30 p. m.

Donations of sheet music, records and musical instruments will be received at the Arts Club of Washington tomorrow afternoon, from 4 to 6 o'clock, at a tea aranged by the committee on music for the armed services. This event will start a general campaign for the collection of musical material wihch will be distributed to the camps and recreation centers in and about the city. A soldier, a sailor and a marine will be present tomorrow to receive on behalf of his band a piece of music autographed for the occasion by Irving Berlin. Mmes. Ralph Rogers, Eugene Byrnes and Stuart Godfrey are among the members of the committee.

The Gertrude Clarke Whittall Foundation in the Library of Congress will present the Budapest String Quartet (Josef Roismann, Alexander Schneider, Boris Kroyt and Mischa Schneider), in Coolidge Auditorium, on Friday night. The program consists of Mozart's B-flat major quartet, K. V. 458; Elgar's E minor quartet, Opus 83, and Smetana's E minor quartet, "From My Life." Budapest Group Records Quartet By Beethoven

By Edward Ryan

The Budapest Quartet's performance of Beethoven's last complete work, the Quartet in F Major, Opus 135—newly issued by Columbia—is about as fine as you could hope to hear. The records, three large ones, are in Album 489.

Readings of Beethoven's works by the Budapest ensemble are familiar to many Washington music lovers who have heard the group play at the Library of Congress. Their interpretation, marked by its warmth and vigor, loses little if anything in the transfer to records, and these qualities are particularly worth noting in their performance of the last quarter.

The F Major is probably the most easily approachable of Beethoven's last major works, and the Budapest group enters well into this spirit, especially in the melodious first movement, and the more rugged fourth. With all that, the high point of the music is the beautiful, grave, slow movement, and it is here that the rich, yet delicate, playing of the Budapest Quartet is most satisfying. There's not a soft spot in their playing, nor a disappointment in the recording.

A little less can be said for the new recording of Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique, performed by Arthur Rodzinski and the Cleveland Orchestra, and issued by Columbia in Album 488, six large discs.

While the recording is excellent, the performance falls short of the recently recorded version played by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, with Bruno Walter conducting. There is plenty of room for disagreement in choosing between the two, but the Paris organization appears to have brought to their performance a more exact feeling for the mad story Berlioz told in his music.

Heard by itself, without comparison, however, the Rodzinski performance—the first recording of the work by an American orchestra—offers plenty of rewards for the record listeners. Their interpretation is well balanced, showing delicacy and restraint in the first movements, and a proper blood-and-thunder spirit where it counts in the last two movements.

One single you will want to hear is Columbia's edition of Lotte Lehmann singing the familiar Brahms' Cradle Song. It's a 10-inch disc—and perhaps too brief a one—but it carries an extra surprise, in that you may find yourself liking the second side even better—the same artist singing a Brahms Serenade "Standchen." The piano accompaniment is by Paul Ulanowsky.

Philadelphia Plays Symphonic Finale Wednesday Night

Having completed the regular subscription series for the season, the Philadelphia Orchestra will give a special post-season concert in Constitution Hall on Wednesday night. Eugene Ormandy has announced a "Three B" program consisting of Bach's Toccata, Intermezzo and Fugue in C major, Beethoven's seventh symphony and Brahms' second symphony. To these classical works will be added Harl McDonald's "San Juan Capistrano."

McDonald, who resigned as director of the music department of the University of Pennsylvania to become manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is 43 years old and a native of Colorado. "San Juan Capistrano," consisting of two nocturnes, "The Mission" and "Fiesta," is his latest composition in a list which included four symphonies, a two-piano concerto, "Festival of the Workers," "Three Hebraic Poems" and "Lament for the Stolen."

Reservations for Wednesday's concert can be made at Jordan's box-office, 1239 G Street.

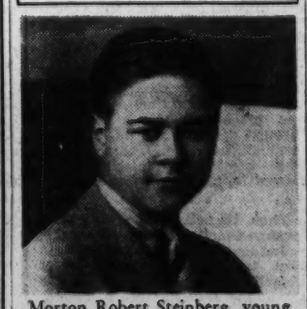
Inez Payne, piano; Mary Alice Ferguson, violin, and Ruth Ferguson, piano, will present the Sunday Music Hour program at 5 o'clock this afternoon in the Young Women's Christian Association.



Morton Robert Steinberg, young resident pianist, who will be presented by Felicia Rybier in a recital next Sunday night in the Washington Club.

French Show Opens At National Gallery

By Ada Rainey

As if to crown with distinction the completion of its first year of existence, the National Gallery of Art will show an additional loan of paintings from the Chester Dale Collection, recognized as one of the most important groups of nineteenth century French paintings ever gathered by a private individual. The collection will be opened today where, with the three rooms already installed, and two rooms recently completed, it will complete a group which is unrivaled in its significance of dramatic power and expression. One can here easily sense the reason why France for so long held sway as the arbiter of art in Europe and extended its influence to America, until the present decade.

Art on the Air

Miss Rainey will begin a new radio series, devoted to art in Washington, on station WINX, Tuesday, at 3:05 p. m.

The painters that depict in brilliant array the rich color and strong individuality of the past century were giants who dipped their brushes in human values, painting broadly the thoughts and feelings of their countrymen, the beauty of the quiet rivers and serene landscape, the lovely light reflected on the facades of historic cathedrals, that shimmered in the iridescent water of the Venetian canals or flared in the overheated rooms of the Moulin Rouge. It is Paris, heart of France, without which one cannot imagine the French artist could possibly be inspired to paint, that is expressed with harmonous flow of forms and intricate patterns. It is a world of seductive charms and sophisticated nuances.

The outstanding personalities of the triumvirate of painters that turned the tide of art into the channel of what is popularly called modern art, is well represented. Gauguin, Van Gogh, Cezanne instead of being breakers of tradition and stirrers up of sedition, as they were thought to be in their day, seem mildly expressive, after the blatant and stentorian tones of the contemporary painter that is so widely heralded by press and dealers today. Have we grown blase or merely accustomed to the new language of today? It is stimulating, this comparison, and we can with profit ask ourselves if our eyes are not seeing with understanding, what these pioneers were so roundly abused for expressing at an earlier time.

One is tremendously impressed with the harmony of color of the paintings in walking through the rooms that are hung with such sensitive perception. The color in the self-portrait and paintings by Van Gogh; the charming Mousmes; the "Olive Orchard," self-portrait and "Fatata te Miti" of Gauguin, and the subdued tones of the Cezannes are wonderfully impressive. Mary Cassatt, the one woman and American included in the group because she was so intimately associated with this Paris School, fairly sings in her canvases: "Mother and Child," "The Boating Party," "The Loge" and the "Woman With the Red Carnation." The striking chalk drawings by Toulouse-Lautrec, decidedly impressionistic in form and expressive of life on the left bank of the Seine and its inhabitants of the shadows; Auguste Renoir's fascinatingly feminine portrait in pastels of Madame Severine, who seems to be the personification of the appeal of the Parisienne of that day, the restrained "Portrait of Sonia" by Fantin-Latour and the heads of Daumier and Delacroiz, with "The Promenade" by Courbet, make a combination that draws forth appreciation of a high order.

The paintings were personally selected by Mr. and Mrs. Chestetr Dale, who have chosen really superlative examples of the great Frenchmen, and prove their understanding and authority in their chosen field of art. Washington is fortunate in being the recipient of this famous collection. It is certain we shall grow in appreciation and understanding of the enduring qualities of true art. It adds luster to the many magnificent paintings belonging to the collection of the National Gallery.

Henry W. Olson, president of the club, gives a good account of himself in his paintings of boats and houses which are clean-cut and direct. "Out for a While," a boat undergoing repairs, "After the Storm," and the watercolors, "The Old House" and "Old Trees" are effective. Oke Nordgren scores as usual in his paintings, which are very capable, as for instance, "The Horse and the Storm," and "McSorley's Bar," favorite subject of several painters. Roland Lyon has several excellent pictures, as has Roger M. Rittase, and the "Double Header" of O. R. Carrington and the portrait of "Barbara," by William MacLean, are worthwhile.

"Animal Tent," by Paul Alt, and "View of Brookland" show imagination, a most essential quality; "Morning on the Way" and "Behind the Big Top," by A. W. Lee, are all to the good. The small oil marine view, "Chesapeake Bay," by Ruel P. Tolman, director of the National Museum, is delightful in its quality of the serene sweep of water and the delicate tonality in the colors. Garnet Jex' "Landscape in Early Spring" is most agreeable in subject treatment and color.

At the Central Public Library the landscape group has a small exhibition of water colors which are well painted and show clear, bright color which has been handled with understanding. The exhibiting artists in this water-color group are: Garnet Jex, whose landscapes show gain in his work, especially in regard to his use of color; Alexander Lee, Rowland Lyon, Gustave Trois and Benson Moore. The paintings will be on view until May 2.

At the Petworth Branch of the Public Library there are two interesting exhibitions, quite out of the ordinary. It is not often that teacher's and pupils' works are seen in the same show. The work of the teacher, Miss Norma Rose, is of much excellence. It is made up of landscapes and street scenes with two portraits. The paintings are almost equally divided—oils and water colors. "Taxco, Mexico," "Near Taos," "California Hills" and "Catskills" are all well organized and show intelligence in the handling of her medium and a good feeling for color. The still lifes are particularly happy in expression. Miss Bose is undoubtedly an excellent teacher as well as a painter; otherwise she could not get such good results from her pupils. The students' work is across the hall in the library building and is really unusual of its kind. The students have chosen their own themes and painted them in their own way, with inspiration from their teacher, but not imitation. The still lifes are well thought out and expressed and executed with understanding. The work of Evelyn Wagman, Miriam Kessel and Peter Turner are especially good.

Paintings by Elizabeth Poe, on view at the Phillips Gallery through April 15, are extraordinary in character. Miss Poe has improved tremendously in her work since she first showed her paintings a few years ago. Recently she has been studying with C. Law Watkins and her paintings have grown in construction and organization.

Mostly her water colors are done at night after midnight, it is said, and under inspiration quite extraordinary. Low toned mostly in dark gray, lead and slate, without contrasting colors, the painter obtains a quality startlingly original. They appear like great cosmic structures that are impressive, almost overpowering at times. "Templed Hills" is one of the best and strongest in its organization "Seal Point," "Totem Land," "Never, Never, Land," "Titan's Lair," and "Agate Hills" are among the most outstanding. There is an atmosphere of weirdness, of dreams not understood and a vast structure of rocks, of forces that have an import above the knowledge of man in his material thought that awaken questioning and inspire awe.

Paintings by Ruth Starr Rose reveal a talent of a totally different sort. Here there is a caustic humor, a love of animals, horses, racing and the picturesque world of the outer life. "Chincoteague Wild Pony Round-Up" is one of the most interesting of the painter's canvases which are done in oil and tempera mixed. There is a series of lithographs also on view at the Whyte Gallery that have a quality of imagination delightful and quaint. Many of them are concerned with the singing Negroes of the Eastern Shore of Maryland where the artist was brought up. She shows herself sympathetic to the primitive character of the Negro in an original manner. "Herald Angels" and "The Old Ark's Amovin'" are clever and really most unusual and fascinating—an expression of the thoughts of the primitive Negro that is exceptional. Ruth Rose had a background which was picturesque in the extreme. Brought up in the famous Hope House near Easton on the Eastern Shore, her friends numbered among the socially prominent in Maryland, she is chiefly concerned with interpreting the life around her. It is a rich, picturesque scene that is fast passing away, but has as its subject matter varying industries, fishing, crabbing and farming. She made of her lithographs an important contribution to the art of design and pictorial form. Hope House itself is a treasure trove of the past, historic in traditions, its great rooms and main entrance hall redolent of days of grandeur that were almost fabulous in their beauty and charm. The library is lined with rare books that stand in long rows seen against dark oak woodwork. Outside are gorgeous peacocks that lend their iridescent plumage to brighten life that contrasts with the low lying flats of the bay.

Peabody Radio Awards Win High Praise

By Richard L. Coe

Those vexed at the mediocrity of so much that they hear on the air should take heart at the 1941 George Foster Peabody Radio Awards, the "Pulitzer Prizes" of broadcasting. Announced Friday night, the winners are:

Cecil Brown, for "the best reporting of the news."

"The Bill of Rights" and "Against the Storm" as outstanding in the field of drama.

Alfred Wallenstein, in the field of music.

The Chicago Round Table, for its educational value.

The international short-wave broadcasters of the country for their patriotic service.

Separated from the chaff, these programs are a heartening answer to the critics of American radio. Every one of the awards is deserved recognition for admirable efforts.

This is only the second year for the Peabody Awards. They are made by the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism of the University of Georgia; an advisory board, formed of figures outstanding in their fields and professions, makes the selections.

Idea for this recognition originated with Lambdin Kay, radio pioneer and former manager of Atlanta's WSB. 'He discussed the notion for something comparable to the Pulitzer Prize" for radio with Dean John E. Drewry, of the university's school of journalism, who, in the fall of 1939, laid the idea before Chancellor S. V. Sanford. With Dr. Sanford's encouragement, Dean Drewry discussed the matter at the 1940 convention of the National Association of Broadcasters, where his proposal to have the awards made by the University of Georgia received unanimous indorsement. Together, the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism and the N. A. B. set up the mechanics for making the awards.

In selecting Columbia's Cecil Brown for "best reporting of the news" the committee specifically pays tribute to the networks for their news coverage of eventful 1941. Brown, who has just returned to this country and is about to embark on a lecture tour, is particularly cited for his eyewitness account of the sinking of the Repulse and the Prince of Wales. His determination to tell the truth as he saw it ultimately barred him from the British microphones at Singapore; from there he went to Australia where he stirred that continent to a clear realization of its own danger.

The two awards in drama pay tribute to two vastly different tours de force. The award to Norman Corwin for his unforgettable program, "We Hold These Truths," observing the 150th anniversary of the Bill of Rights, was a veritable must for a broadcast the memory of which still stirs all who heard it. This award for the 31-year-old Corwin stresses once more the necessity of records for programs such as this. There are many who did not hear this moving broacast. It has been recorded. Why can't it be released to the general public?

"Against the Storm" is the afternoon serial (Mondays through Fridays at 3 on WRC) written by Sandra Michaels which has been widely-praised for its intelligent and literate standard. Its scenes are laid in an imaginary university town of the very real occupied France. Although Miss Michael must write 260 episodes each year, it has, since its first hearing in October 1939 become a model of its kind.

The award to Alfred Wallenstein comes as manna to a music public which has long admired his programming of unfamiliar and novel works for his Mutual Sinfonietta—a stand to which he quietly adhered while other conductors grabbed time and national publicity with unending repetitions of dog-eared, tired "classics."

Now in its eleventh year, the Chicago Round Table is recognized for the enormous audience its Sunday afternoon airings command and the spontaneity it achieves in its new method of broadcasting. It has inaugurated the practice of making a rehearsal recording several hours before the actual program. This is played back immediately and methods of improving the broadcast are discussed. This plan enables speakers to integrate and strengthen their points and has helped overcome "mike fright."

The committee found the year's most worthwhile innovation in the international short-wave broadcasts which have gone to the dominated lands of Europe, observing "it is unfair to single out anyone station for this admirable work." All the short-wave broadcasters and their coordinator, Stanley P. Richardson, were cited for their initiative.

Television Fails to Halt Despite War

Wide World

New York, April 11.—Unlike London, where television shut down when war came, in America it has gone right ahead. Apparently it plans to continue for the duration, turning largely from entertainment to civilian defense instruction and the like.

Meanwhile television looks to the possible post-war goal of becoming an important industry, just as radio did after the first World War.

Some have regarded television's immediate future as uncertain due to priorities and the fact that no more receivers are available. However, the Federal Communications Commission called a conference this week at which various wartime problems are to be discussed.

N. B. C., pioneer in television broadcasting, has this to say as to prospects: "Television seems pretty certain to follow the path of civilian defense work for the duration, with the entertainment development subordinated to an important extent to this more serious business.

"Thus, television apparently has demonstrated its right to continue wherever it has been established."

C. B. S., also active in concentrating on civilian defense aids, comments: "It appears that broadcasting ativities will continue along present lines barring unforseen and uncontrolable developments."

WOL Series Is Basis Of Philadelphians' Concert This Week

Mutual network's regular Friday afternoon series of symphonic concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra form the basis of the program with which that orchestra will conclude Washington's winter symphonic season Wednesday night in Constitution Hall.

In planning his programs for the season, Conductor Eugene Ormandy devised one series especially for his radio listeners, calling it "The Three Bs," a cycle devoted to the works of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. The WOL series, which began in October, has followed the fruition of Ormandy's plan, from which he has selected representatives of three separate programs for Wednesday evening's concert: his own orchestral transcription of the Bach Toccata, Intermezzo and Fugue; the Beethoven Seventh Symphony and the Second Symphony of Johannes Brahms.

The Philadelphia-Mutual series is expected to last several weeks longer, going on the air locally at 3:15, three-quarters of an hour after New York's WOL picks up the concert.

Radio

Pan-American Day, Tuesday, will receive special radio salutes all this week, but as a matter of fact the broadcasters regularly sound the good neighbor note.

Last week Carmen Miranda was tutoring Author Rex Stout for his date on the new Friday night series, Celebrity Theater.

Authorized by the Brazilian government, Olga Coelho sings songs of her native land to her own guitar accompaniment Monday nights at 10:30 on WJSV.

Tulsa Progressive Education Program Example to Nation

By Ben Funk.

Wide World Staff Writer

Tulsa, Okla., April 11.—Here, near the geographical heart of the Nation, is an example of a new school program which may prove as vital to America's destiny as the strength of her arms.

It is called "progressive education." Its goal is the development of a new generation equipped to preserve and extend the democratic way of life.

Tulsa is one of 30 cities in which for eight years the Progressive Education Association spent half a million dollars on a comparison of deliberately planned new-style education versus the style common throughout America.

The experiment has just been finished. The high point was the test of 1475 students of the 30 progressive schools matched with an equal number of graduates of traditional schools.

These progressive school products scored higher in all lines except two—foreign languages and athletics.

They won more honors, had more drive, were more precise thinkers, more resourceful in practical problems, knew better what they wanted to do, were more active in art, music, drama, took keener interest in news and world affairs, were more careful in chosing jobs.

Backgrounds Were Equal

Here in Tulsa, under the supervision of stocky, studious Superintendent Harry Gowans, two groups of students were selected, each with identical intelligence ratings, same types of family backgrounds and same general interests and ambitions.

The "progressive" students were given almost absolute freedom in selecting their courses, although a few courses considered essential to any general education, such as English and history, were required. But even these were liberalized and enlivened.

The "traditional" students, on the other hand, were taught in the old-fashioned manner. They enrolled in all courses required for college entrance, regardless of whether they were expected to go to college or to use such knowledge in their careers.

"We encouraged the students," Gowans said, "to develop their interests and abilities physically, intellectually, socially, emotionally and spiritually to the fullest measure, so that they might become more desirable members of society."

The most important problems of the students were careers, marriage, politics.

Less Emphasis on Textbooks

Economics and biology were given a close connection with family relations. Less emphasis was placed on textbooks, and boys and girls together discussed problems of modern living.

In mathematics students studied logic and the nature of proof instead of cut-and-dried theorems. In Latin they read Cicero's letters in place of his orations.

One project which students planned and carried out was called "Cherokee problem house."

A young married couple had just bought a dilapidated shack on a ten-acre farm and a "progressive" pupil saw in it a chance to help the couple and at the same time get valuable experience in home planning.

With the consent of the owners, a class rebuilt and furnished the house and landscaped the ground, using no money except $200 which the young couple had planned to spend.

For those students who expected to go to work after graduation from high school, there were specialized courses in auto mechanics, carpentry, bookkeeping, printing, retail selling, dressmaking and many other practical fields.

Under direction of E. P. Chandler, trades and industrial teacher, a cooperative program was initiated in which some 200 students held half-time jobs in stores, shops and industrial plants.

A Case History

Typical of this group is 17-year-old Marshall Matthews, who wants to be an automobile mechanic, doesn't think he will have an opportunity to go to college.

In the mornings Marshall works as an apprentice in a garage. In the afternoons he goes to school and studies occupational relations, blueprint reading, industrial history, vocational English and other subjects which will help him to go to the top in his vocation.

Students study the workings of democratic government, get experience with school governments of their own in which they elect a president, senate and house of representatives. These groups work with the faculty.

Students with dramatic talents are encouraged. The Tulsa Central "High School Daze," an annual stage extravaganza written, produced and promoted by students, plays to packed houses, pays off all deficits in student funds.

As a result of the eight-year study the "progressive" program has been put into effect generally in all Tulsa schools.

From the Nation-wide standpoint, the P.E.A. commission declared that colleges throughout the country had accepted the findings of the study and immediately begun working out revisions of their entrance requirements.

"It looks," said the commission's report, "as if the stimulus and the initiative which the less conventional approach to secondary school education affords sends on to college better human material than we have obtained in the past."

G. W. Teachers To Be Honored

Three teachers who have contributed 25 years of service to the George Washington University will be honored at the annual spring luncheon of the General Alumni Association next Saturday at 1:15 at the Lee Sheraton Hotel.

The three faculty members to whom tribute will be paid are Dr. Thomas Benjamin Brown, professor of physics; Dr. Charles Sager Collier, professor of law, and Dr. Elmer Louis Kayser, dean of University students and professor of European history.

Paul V. McNutt, Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, will address the luncheon meeting on some topic of the day. McNutt, before coming to Washington, was dean of the University of Indiana Law School, Governor of Indiana and Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

Dean Henry Grattan Doyle, who completed 25 years with the institution last year, will discuss the contributions Dr. Brown, Dr. Collier and Dean Kayser have made to the university and to the students. Dean Doyle is head of Columbian College and professor of Romance languages.

Each of the professors to be honored on Saturday has made notable contributions to this line of endeavor in the past 25 years.

'A. T. P. Brothers In Armed Forces To Get Chain-Note

Members of the fraternity of Alpha Theta Phi of the American University have revived the long-dead chain letter idea and have added the modern touch to produce results. A general greeting has been sent to one of the fraternity alumni now serving with the armed forces with instructions to read the greeting and then add a page of news relative to his own activities. He then crosses off his name on the enclosed list of fellow brothers in the service and sends the letter plus his addition to the next name on the list.

Each man notifies the fraternity president at the University by postal card to whom and when he forwarded the letter. It is anticipated that the chain will end in three months time when the original letter plus the news items will be read before the active fraternity group in Washington. The only problem to date is what news the censor will delete as the chain progresses.

International Law Of Future Mapped

The current number of Ethics (an international journal of social, political and legal philosophy) carries an article on the future of international law (Interpersonal and International Reality—Some facts to remember for the remaking of international law) by Dr. Gerhart Husserl, professor of law in the National University Law School.

Dr. Husserl, now an American citizen, holds a doctor's degree from the University of Freiburg

Education

A part-time program is a product of "Progressive Education" methods in Tulsa, Okla., schools. Two hundred high school students who expect to go to work after graduation hold half-time jobs in stores, shops and industrial plants. Typical of this group is 17-year-old Marshall Matthews, pictured here, who wants to be an automobile mechanic. He works half days as an auto mechanic's apprentice (below), then goes to school half days to study subjects (above), which will help him along in his profession . . . As a result of an eight-year study by the Progressive Education Association, the progressive program has been put into effect generally in all Tulsa schools

Georgetown U. Will Honor Dr. Van Slyke

One of the leading chemists in the United States and a public health service specialist in nervous diseases have been designated for the 1942 honors of the Kober Foundation of Georgetown University, the Very Rev. Arthur A. O'Leary, S. J., president announced yesterday.

Dr. Donald Dexter Van Slyke, of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, New York City, whose work in chemistry has won outstanding recognition, will receive the Kober medal for scientific research in medicine. The award will be presented at the anual meeting of the Association of American Physicians in Atlantic City on May 5.

The Kober Foundation lecturer for this year will be Dr. Charles Armstrong, chief of the division of infectious diseases of the Public Health Service. He will deliver the lecture the evening of May 5 at Georgetown University, before an audience of physicians and scientists, in Gaston Hall. His topic will be, "Recent Developments in Neurotropic Diseases."

The late Dr. George Martin Kober, for many years dean of medicine at Georgetown University, endowed the scientific foundation for the purpose of rewarding leading scientists of this country. Selections were left to the determination of three groups to which Dr. Kober belonged during his lifetime—the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, the Association of American Physicians and the Association of Military Surgeons of the United States.

This year the medalist was chosen by the Association of American Physicians and the lecturer by the Association of Military Surgeons.

Dr. Van Slyke has been chemist of the Rockefeller Institute since 1914 and has written more than 200 pamphlets and several volumes dealing with the science of chemistry. He is the holder of the Conne Medal and the Willard Gibbs Medal of the American Chemical Society.

As the Kober lecturer, which carries also a $500 award, Dr. Armstrong was singled out for his research work in virus diseases that attack the brain and nervous system. He has been with the Public Health Service since 1916 and the National Institute of Health's Division of Infectious Diseases since 1921.

N. E. A. Unit To Hold Convention

"Fitness to Victory" will be the theme of the forty-seventh annual convention of the American Association for Health, Physical Education and Recreation, a department of the National Education Association, to be held in New Orleans April 15 to 18.

"This war demands the development of total fitness on the part of every individual in the United States. This total fitness is essential to the maintenance of our democracy," says Anne Schley Duggan, president of the association. Delegates to the three-day convention will discuss the ways in which programs of health, physical education and recreation may be developed to contribute most effectively to the welfare of the Nation, Dr. Duggan pointed out.

Reexamination of present programs with reference to their effective contribution to the maximum development of physical, mental, social and spiritual well being of all persons, will be presented in a panel discussion featuring a general session of the convention. Meeting in another general session, the 2000 educators will hear explained the fitness programs of schools and colleges, private agencies and public agencies.

A working conference forum will be a convention innovation this year. For one entire day, delegates will meet in general sessions discussing the challenge of national fitness. Robert L. Sutherland, Hogg Foundation of Mental Hygene, Austin, Tex., will present the keynote address. Application of the address will be made to the three divisions of the association by outstanding leaders in the fields of health, physical education and recreation. Following the addresses delegates will separate into three conference groups to discuss problems of the elementary, secondary and college level programs.

Swing Sessions

With Bill Gottlieb

About once every three or four months I get impressed all over again with Harry James and his orchestra. A recurrence was inevitable this week, for staring me right in the face have been no less than six James sides, all taken from recent record releases. No one side is in the stupendous category; but some are superior items and all are above average. Most noteworthy is the band's job on the popular "Skylark," with particular credit to Harry James' inventive horn and secondary praise to Helen Forrest's vocal and, of course, the entire band working as a unit. On the strictly instrumental side, there's dreamy "Sleepy Lagoon," a number that gives the strings (including a harp) a big play, together with the boss's horn; there's brisk "Trumpet Blues," with biting work by the entire brass section; and, finally, there are "Crazy Rhythm" and "The Clipper," two rapid tempo jobs handled with dispatch by James and Co.

The happy thing about the James band is that the entire organization has body and balance and other musicianly qualities not often found among new groups led by famed solo stars. Most of the brilliant soloists who go out on their own are found to be deficient as directors of an entire musical unit and too often they are concerned only with building up their own personal share in a performance. They become spectacular and overbearing. It so happens that James himself is guilty of this last fault. His horn, unsurpassed for the thrilling, dynamic tone it produces, has of late become too obviously grandiose. Harry, you know, was born in a circus tent, the son of the leader of a circus band. He himself has been a circus musician (and even a juggler who could jump through a hoop with a glass of water balanced on his chin). The exaggerated flare displayed by James these days makes him sound like he thinks he's returned to the big top.

But in spite of this criticism, these recent James sides prove there's still a lot of real, honest punch in his horn, as well as showmanship. And—to repeat—in addition to Harry, there's his swell band, even to a swinging string section which, though more modest than Shaw's, often does a better job than do Artie's transplanted long-hairs.

Record Briefs

Righteous Swing: Lest you think the last sentence above belittles Shaw, let me hasten to add that the best single record of the week is brother Artie's coupling of "Deuces Wild" and "To A Broadway Rose," both rhythm bits. Another good bet comes from Jimmy Dorsey, who blows two sides on "Tain't No Good," a rocking tune that boasts the cleverest lyrics to come this way in a long time. And there's Gene Krupa with a jive piece, "Pass The Bounce" and a stepped up "Me and My Melinda."

Popular Swing and Sweet: Eddy Duchin, keyboard caresser, plays a whole album of Cole Porter tunes like "Night and Day" and "I've Got You Under My Skin" on Columbia set C-87. Competitor Carmen Cavallaro holds his own with "Always in My Heart" and "She Is." Hal McIntyre, who continues to score sensationally everyplace but in this column, continues his march with "The Mem'ry of This Dance" and "There Are Rivers to Cross." Remember those wonderful Ray Noble specialties of some years back? Ray revives two of them this week, "Goodnight Sweetheart" and "The Very Thought of You" (both written by Ray, incidentally), and they sound almost as good as they did way back when. . . . A can't-miss novelty is "Breathless," a pleasant tune that tumbles out with a new idea in lyrics. Shep Fields and the Merry Macs start the ball rolling.

A little late, but still safe, is Guy Lombardo with "Deep in the Heart of Texas." "Sleepy Lagoon," the pretty tune mentioned in an earlier paragraph, is handled by the Vaughn Monroe crew and sung by Monroe. The song, played in fox trot tempo by James, comes out a waltz under the Monroe baton. Two cute items with war-like slants are Glenn Miller's "Shhh, It's A Military Secret and Teddy Powell's "Shortage of Love." One of the last discs cut by Will Bradley before his split with Ray McKinley is the pairing of "I Guess I'll Be On My Way" and "Seeing You Again Did Me No Good."

Sea Isle City Ready For Summer Visitors

Sea Isle City, N. J.

The appearance of its wide, 3-mile boardwalk enhanced by the "dim-out" at nightfall, and its cottagers already busily engaged with paint brush and rake, Sea Isle City looks to a splendid season from more than one viewpoint.

Sea Isle City expects to build much of its social season this year around its attractive new Yacht Club and boat basin, which opens shortly. Its lifeguards are jealous of a 22-year-old record of no fatalities on protected beaches.

The Homestead Open to Public As Japs Leave

Hot Springs, Va.

Following the departure of the Japanese Diplomatic Corps which had been sheltered here at the request of the United States Government, the Homestead is again open to the public.

This is the 176th year for this picturesque resort which now comprises 17,000 acres of beautiful Alleghany mountain countryside, with the 650-room Homestead at its center.

Reservations already booked indicate heavy business this year, especially from Washington and other headquarters of war activity, despite the tire situation. The Homestead was established as one of the world's leading resorts for generations before the motor car was invented, the management points out.

From April to November the emphasis here is on outdoors life. Sports are well provided for by three golf courses, en-tout-cas and clay tennis courts, and elaborate facilities for riding, skeet, hunting, fishing, badminton, and bowling on the green. Less strenuous outdoors pursuits include steak roasts on the mountain tops, dinners on the Homestead lawns, driving in old-fashioned surreys, hiking through the mountain trails and the Cascades gorge, and spectator sports.

The Homestead is the center of one of the most self-contained communities to be found anywhere. It provides the village with electric, telephone and police service, paves its own streets, and operates its own theater, retail shops, vegetable and poultry farms, greenhouse and a large dairy, as well as shops for the manufacture and repair of furniture, mattresses, silverware, and saddlery.

Some idea of the extent of the operation can be gained from these statistics. The hotel has 800 employes, 25,000 pieces of silverware, 5000 napkins, 9000 pillow cases, 35 motor vehicles, and 27 horse-drawn vehicles. There are 154 buildings on the property, and the telephone exchange handles an average of 8290 calls daily. The Homestead owns 77 horses, 244 cows, 515 sheep and 125 pigs. Last year the dairy produced 36,000 gallons of milk and 2100 gallons of cream, while the poultry farm delivered 21,000 dozen eggs. About 75,000 feet of timber are cut on the estate each year, while ten bridges and four fords are maintained.

Shenandoah Valley Offers Spring Tonic

Staunton, Va.

A glorious spring tonic: That, in a nutshell, is an apt description of a spring trip through the beautiful, historic Shenandoah Valley of Virginia.

Cradled between the majestic Blue Ridge Mountains and the more austere Alleghanies, the Shenandoah Valley extends from the Potomac River southward to Roanoke, Va., and offers the traveler a veritable wonderland of scenic splendor and historic lore.

Stretching from the northernmost to the southernmost end of the Shenandoah is U. S. Highway 11, a three-lane drive which is better known as the "Great Valley Pike." Once an Indian trail, it was first laid out as a highway by Maj. Pierre Charles L'Enfant, the French engineer and architect who planned Washington, D. C.

Along the Valley Pike, north from Winchester, young Capt. George Washington led British troops against the French in the French and Indian War. In 1862 "Stonewall" Jackson marched his "foot cavalry" up and down this highway to drive Northern invaders from the "Granary of the Confederacy;" and, in 1864, Gen. Sheridan's famous ride, which turned a Union defeat into victory, proceeded southward on the Valley Pike from Winchester to Cedar Grove, "20 miles away."

The famous Natural Bridge of Virginia, one of the Seven Wonders of the World—a stupendous arch which "carries a highway, spans a river, and makes two mountains one"—is located 40 miles north of Roanoke, in the Valley proper.

Lexington, "Shrine of the Southland," 14 miles north of Natural Bridge, is the location of Washington and Lee University, Virginia Military Institute, the Lee Chapel, containing the tomb of Gen. Robert E. Lee and members of his family; the grave of "Stonewall" Jackson and many other mementoes of the War Between the States.

Vast caverns, which extend like subterranean cities beneath the Valley floor are world renowned, and to explore one is an unforgettable experience. Far underground you have the illusion of sunshine, so brilliantly are the caverns illuminated by electricity. Beneath the lights the many-colored stalactites sparkle like jewels. The caverns are dry and safe, and no one is permittted to enter unless accompanied by a guide.

Here, too, is the beautiful Shenandoah National Park and the magnificent Skyline Drive, which stretches for miles along the crest of the Blue Ridge Mountains, overlooking the gorgeous Valley of the Shenandoah.

The Shenandoah Valley also offers the vacationist many resorts and hotels, with accommodations to suit everyone, and every purse.

Spring Comes in a Hurry South of the Rio Grande

Winter takes a long time to end north of the Rio Grande, but south of the border spring is always in a hurry. In Mexico, April is the month for sunshine, not for showers. While blustering gales blow farther north, down Mexico way visitors enjoy balmy breezes fragrant with the odor of freshly blooming flowers. And it is then that the fabulous beauty of the floating gardens of Xochimilco are at their loveliest.

When you drive along the magnificent boulevard that connects Mexico City with Xochimilco, 15 miles south of the capital, you are traversing a highway that made history. Centuries ago it was one of the three principal causeways that connected the mainland to Tenochtitlan, the island capital of the Aztecs. It was over this very road that Cortez marched in his conquest of the native inhabitants of Mexico City and Xochimilco.

Three centuries later, the conquerors reconstructed the old Indian road into a fashionable boulevard where elegant members of vice-regal society displayed themselves, their finery and their fast-stepping horses on Sunday mornings. And today modern buses and streamlined private motor cars whizz past the beautiful, historic drive, pleasure-bound for the floating gardens of Xochimilco, romantic Mexico's most romantic spot.

At Xochimilco you step into a flat-bottomed boat covered with floral decorations. The boats are propelled like the Venetian gondolas by singing oarsmen who cheerfully produce a wide variety of Mexican melodies as they skilfully direct their launches through the labyrinth of canals. Floating restaurants pass by, offering tempting Mexican foods and drinks. Vendors with flower-laden boats offer exquisite garlands and bouquets of the carnations, roses and violets which flourish on the islands.

Floating orchestras and Mariachi singers accompany your boat as you drift down these idyllic waterways. Picnic parties bring their own lunches, or stop to eat at one of the charming open-air restaurants. Happy Mexican families, out for a day's excursion, bring their own musical instruments, and gaily sing lively Mexican tunes. A line of boats is moored to the outdoor dance hall where visitors pause for a refreshing drink and a few dances to the exotic music of native orchestras. Then there are long, twisting canals, shadowed by the green branches of overhanging trees, and perfumed by the aroma of sweet-smelling flowers growing on the banks where, except for the song of a solitary bird, utter silence prevails.

The Chinampas, or floating gardens, were originally made by native inhabitants over five centuries ago by interlacing twigs into a firm, strong mat. These mats were then covered with thin layers of earth. Although they were often over a hundred feet long, they were sufficiently light to be easily moved across the lake by oars. These floating pods of earth formed the island kingdom of the Chichimecas in the thirteenth century.

At Xochimilco in the spring, you will drink deep of life's beauty, and regain the joy in living so many of us have forgotten. You will return with renewed zeal and heightened energy for the many tasks that lie ahead, comforted with the thought that someplace in this war-torn world, spring still is, and always will be beautiful.

Southern Pines Season Is Now At Its Height

Southern Pines, N. C.

The season at Southern Pines is now at its height and the North Carolina Sandhills resort section is a mass of blossoms with the dogwood and wistaria in full bloom. Visitors are arriving daily from the North and the South to see spring at its best. The next two weeks will list several major golf tournament, opening today with the qualifying round of the fifth annual Sandpipers golf championship to be played over the 6800-yard No. 1 course. A field of about 40 golfers will tee off in this tournament. It will be followed with the championship of the Pine Dodgers, the women's golfing organization, next week. Other tournaments on the calendar include a Scotch foursome, in which the men will pair with the ladies in a best ball event.

Another event being looked forward to by members of the winter colony is the annual Thistle Club picnic to be held at the country club on Wednesday, April 29, and which many visitors from the hotels will attend.

Plans are also being made for the fourth annual North Carolina Junior Chamber of Commerce tournament to be played at the club early in May. The tournament will be a 36-hole medal event.

Ocean City Expecting Big Summer

Ocean City.—The Easter crowds this year reached an all-time high, giving the boardwalk the appearance of a mid-season afternoon. If this is indicative of the coming summer, Ocean City is facing one of the biggest seasons in it's history; substantiating this, realtors are reporting numerous rentals, many of them on long-term leases, while property sales are considerably in advance of previous years.

Boardwalk Business Will Be Opened Early

Wildwood, N. J.

Boardwalk establishments will open earlier than usual, a survey disclosed today. Considerable activity prevails on the boardwalk with many of the concessionnaires getting their places in readiness. The Casino Arcade, the Cedar-Schellenger Corporation and the Ocean Pier, three of the major amusements here, are making extensive alterations to their equipment.

Wildwood is looking forward to a busy season, Mayor George W. Krogman explained. That this summer will break all prosperity records in this country was the recent prediction of a joint committee on nonessential expenditures. It bases its forecast upon a national income at 105 billion dollars. Because Wildwood is in close proximity to defense areas, about 100 miles distance, large crowds are expected

OCEAN CITY New Jersey

Atlantic City Looks Forward To Tourney

Atlantic City.

With the national championship tournament of the Professional Golfers Association scheduled for May 25 to 31, Atlantic City now presents the big event which will mark the Memorial Day week-end and thus the closing of the spring season and opening of the summer schedule.

Golf's greatest show, the only national tournament to be held this year, will be presented at Atlantic City's famous Seaview Country Club. Playing in the tournament will be the Nation's 120 leading professional golfers. An effort is being made to obtain a furlough for Viv Ghezzi, of Deal, N. J., defending champion, now in the Army, so that he may be on hand for the competition here.

Practice rounds will be played on May 23 and 24. There will be 36 holes of medal play on May 25 and 26, with the low 31 players and the defending champion qualifying for match play, which gets under way the following day. All of the matches will be staged at 36 holes, with the semifinals on Saturday and the finals on Sunday.

The club at which the tournament will be played is one of the Nation's best-known and most exclusive. Its membership, a list of some 700 in every State in the Union and Canada, presents many of the country's political, industrial and financial leaders. Every president in the past 35 years has been an honorary member and several have visited there.

Because of the nearness of Atlantic City to the great metropolitan areas of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, an unusually large crowd is expected down here over the Memorial Day week-end, both to witness the final rounds of the tournament and to get their first summer tan. The Atlantic City Beach Patrol goes on duty that week-end and the beaches are thus officially opened for the bathers.

Meanwhile the resort becomes the setting for the annual meetings of a long list of convention groups and continues to be the Nation's favorite place to spend the week-end. Hotels present a wide variety of programs to combine with the city's many natural advantages.

North Carolina Offers All Types Of Recreation

Raleigh, N. C.

Within 500 miles travel of half the population of the Nation, North Carolina's variety vacationland beckons with the highest mountains East of the Mississippi and nearly 300 miles of sandy beaches stretching southward from Roanoke Island, where the first English settlement in America was established in 1584.

North Carolina is an all-year vacation State. Its mid-South Sandhills resorts are famous for their mild winter and early spring climate, but it is in the spring and summer and autumn that the majority of travelers find the State at its best.

Spring begins early in North Carolina. It never departs, in fact, from subtropical Smith Island just off Southport at the extreme southern end of its coast. North from Southport toward Wilmington and just off U. S. Highway 17 is Orton, with its 200-year-old mansion and gardens in which azaleas attain their peak in April.

Wilmington is a beach resort, and nearby Wrightsville, Carolina, Kure's and Wilmington beaches have accomodations for thousands of vacationists. Up the coast are Morehead City and Beaufort, popular summer resorts long before the day of automobiles; Ocracoke and Hatteras, the former accessible only by water, and Nags Head and Kitty Hawk, where the Wright brothers made the first flight, and the Currituck Peninsula—Mecca in midwinter for sportsmen who know where the best wildfowl shooting in America is to be found.

Inland lies the Coastal Plain, where the traveler finds the Dutch colonists at Terra Ceia, whose tulips reach their blossoming peak in May; and the turning of the rich earth for planting peanuts, this year not only important as a confection, but a vital necessity to our war effort for the oil they yield, and tobacco and cotton. Here also are serene lakes, bordered with cypress and Spanish moss.

At the edge of the coastal plain is Raleigh, with its century-old capitol, an architectural masterpiece in native granite; Duke University, with its beautiful campus and gorgeous gardens, and at Chapel Hill is the University of North Carolina, oldest State university in the Nation.

Flowers Greet Visitors to Pennsylvania

Harrisburg, Pa.

Visitors to Pennsylvania are in for a spring floral treat with the hillsides bursting into blooming wildflowers.

The Pennsylvania Department of Commerce reports that in some of the southern sections colorful flowers are now apparent and the State invites vacationists to partake of the spring floral tonic.

Early birds in the blossom family are the delicate hepatica, pink and white rue anemone, pussy willows, and violets followed by arbutus and blood root. The shadbush tree and the redbud are among the first to appear in the cast of the State-wide flower show.

Nearly half of the Keystone State is composed of wooded areas where spring blossoms flourish at the first sign of warm weather. Cook Forest, near DuRois and Punxsutawney, covering 6000 acres, and a popular vacation spot for Ohioans and southern New York Staters as well as Pennsylvanians, presents a colorful array of blossom beauty in the spring. Alleghany National Forest, near Kane, is another place where hikers can see the first colors of spring. A few of the State's numerous parks where visitors will find blossomings are at Caledonia, between Chambersburg and Gettysburg; Pine Grove Furnace, just southwest of Carlisle; in more than a dozen State parks in the center of the State near State College, Lewistown and Williamsport, including Joyce Kilmer Park, Tea Springs, Mount Logan, Ravensburg and others.

The Pocono region with Childs, Snow Hill Lake, Peck's Pond and Promised Land State Parks is another ideal area for April and May flowers.

The Washington Philatelist

By William M. Stuart

With the approval of the Postoffice Department, the Treasury has declared defense savings stamps obligations of the United States, and therefore not to be listed as collectors' items. Although this declaration is official, many defense stamps are being added to private collections. The sale of these stamps for systematic saving increases daily, the resulting amount being applied on the purchase of defense savings bonds. Letters bearing defense stamps are returned to senders, as postal regulations prohibit their use on mail matter. However, there are covers being delivered despite prohibitive regulations. These must be termed merely philatelic items of no financial value.

STUART

There have also been exposed a number of "endless chain letter" schemes soliciting defense stamps. Sending such matter through the mails is a violation of the postal fraud and lottery statutes. It is just another scheme to defraud the public, and stamp collectors especially should take warning. Many concerns are using the smaller denominations of defense stamps as currency, but this also has its difficulties. While the method may be legal, it is up to the individual to decide his acceptance of stamps in payment. But one's patriotism should not be questioned if he refuses such payment of accounts due. Defense stamps are sold for a specific purpose only.

The general stamp collector is literally reaping a harvest in foreign issues as well as covers, both censored and otherwise. In spite of the war, stamps are being issued the world over, and new issues are appearing with regularity. In some countries at war new issues are used through surcharges and overprints, and also colors have been changed to meet conditions of ink and dye shortages. Then the matter of paper has been of some concern in some nations, and consequently new issues have been circulated, the collector being the real beneficiary. Prominent in the field of war covers are those coming here in increasing numbers from Free France and her colonies. Washington collectors have added censored covers to their collections, some having more than 60 countries represented.

Curacao has issued a set of 17 denominations. Several of the stamps are of the numeral type, the others being a portrait of the queen. The colors and denominations of the stamps with portrait of Queen Wilhelmina are 6-cent, violet; 10-c., orange; 12½-c., green; 15-c., ultramarine; 20-c., orange; 21-c., gray; 25-c., red violet; 27½-c., brown; 30-c., sepia; 1½-guilden, dark olive and 2½-g., red violet. Of the numeral type the stamps are 1-cent, brown; 1½-c., blue; 2-c., orange; 2½-c., green, and 5-c., red. The numeral is in an oval design inscribed "Curacao" at the top and "cent" at the bottom.

One of the most interesting war covers is one received from Capetown, South Africa. It was mailed at Capetown and took about three weeks to get to the United States. The stamps used are two of the latest issue, the 1½-pence denomination showing the portrait of Lieut. Bob Kershaw,

D. S. O., with Hurricane planes in a symbolic design at the bottom of the stamp. The censor label is inscribed in the duplicate manner stamps of the Union of South Africa are set up with: "Unie van suid-Afrika" on the top line of the left side, "Deur Sensor" under that and "Oopgenaak" on the third line. The English translation is, "Union of South Africa, Opened by Censor."

Equally as interesting to collectors are the covers that are being returned from the Pacific area. Mail addressed to China and Tokyo are being returned with the caption, "Returned to Sender; Service Suspended." Hundreds of pieces of mail sent late November and in early December to both China and Japan are returned. Letters also sent to Manila are being returned. Some of the covers sent to both China and Japan have been returned via San Francisco, as they bear postmarks of the latter city. Some of the mail reached Honolulu and was returned from that city. Some of the covers also bear the label, "Passed by Censor," though not all of the returned mail has been so treated.

Great Britain has the most unusual censor marks up to this time. Many letters sent to England have been returned, containing more than they should, according to the censor clerk. In cases where letters have been thus returned the covers can be used again without the payment of other postage. Also, in all such letters that have been returned is a memorandum advising the sender about results of the war which cannot be mentioned.

The Postoffice Department has announced the establishment of new military posts and postoffices as follows: Army Air Corps Technical Training Command, Southern Pines, N. C.; Des Moines Ordnance Plant, Des Moines, Iowa; Fort Greeley, Seattle, Wash.; Camp Hood, Killeen, Tex.; Jay Hawk Ordnance Works, Baxter Springs, Kans.; Kirtland Field, Albuquerque, N. Mex.; Missouri Institute of Aeronautics, Sikeston, Mo.; Camp Rucker, Ozark, Ala.; Camp Swift, Bastrop, Tex., and Wayne County Airport, Romulus, Mich.

New Issues

Uruguay has brought out a new issue and Washington collectors are receiving covers with the new stamps. The stamps honor Francisco Acuna de Figueroa (1790-1862). March 18 is noted as the first day of release. The design of the stamps shows a portrait of de Figueroa above his name and "El Poeta de Montevideo" (The Poet of Montevideo) and "Autor del Himno Nacional" (Author of the National Hymn). The denominations, colors and quantity issued are as follows: 1-centesimo, brown lake, one million; 2c., dark green, 500,000; 5-c., red, one million; 12-c., blue, 40,000, and 50-c., violet, 20,000.

Sweden is reported to have a new stamp ready for release on May 4. It will be a 20-kroner denomination, equal to about $5. This will be the highest postal value in Sweden and will be used for air mail.

Grenada has issued the 1938 series of the four lowest values, ¼, ½, 1 and 2-penny, in different paper, colors and perforations, due to war conditions.

Philatelic Notes

Philatelic meetings scheduled for the week are as follows: Monday evening, Capital Precancel Club, Thomson Community Center; Tuesday evening, Collectors Club, Branch 5, S. P. A., Thomson Community Center, Twelfth and L Streets Northwest, and Thursday evening, East Washington Stamp Club, Eastern High School, Seventeenth and East Capitol Streets Northeast.

H. A. Robinette will hold his ninth auction sale of United States and its possessions in the grill room at the Hay-Adams House on Thursday and Friday evenings, April 23 and 24, at 7:45 o'clock. A total of 1069 lots will be sold. Ernest A. Grant will act as auctioneer.

All members of the armed formes of the United States, whether in this country or abroad, are now entitled to send their letters through the mails free of cost, according to regulations issued by the Postoffice Department.

The Americal Air Mail Society has decided to cancel its annual convention, scheduled for August next. It is planned to hold several regional meetings during the year.

Collectors with covers to receive the first cancellation of the postoffice named for Gen Douglas MacArthur, at MacArthur, Raleigh County, W. Va., on April 15, should mail all envelopes, no limit as to the number, in time to reach the new office not later than tomorrow.

The Collectors Club, Branch 5, S. P. A., met Tuesday evening at the Weeks Stamp Shop, 1410 H Street Northwest as the Thomson School, the usual meeting place, was closed due to the Easter holidays. C. H. Vaughan presided and many lively discussions took place in connection with many matters of business. The bourse was lively and there was a large attendance. Harry B. Mason called attention to the S. P. A. convention in 1944 that Washington has made a bid formally at this time, and he hopes to have the convention approve of this city. The club will meet as usual on Tuesday at the Thomson Community Center. In case of a blackout, the club will meet at the Weeks Stamp Shop, 1410 H Street Northwest, but in any case of doubt inquiry better be made.

Th Silver Spring Hobby Show will be held at the Armory April 16, 17 and 18 and the club will be represented in the stamp section. D. H. Reichgut has charge of the exhibits.

Nordic Chorus Of Duluth Will Sing Today

One of America's outstanding vocal ensembles will make its bow to a local audience in Constitution Hall this afternoon when Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey presents the Duluth Nordic Chorus, directed by Margrethe Hokanson. This organization of 33 young American singers of Scandinavian descent was formed in the spring of 1939 to participate in a reception to Crown Prince Olav and Crown Princess Martha of Norway. Its success on that occasion and in subsequent concerts resulted in an invitation to appear at the biennial convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs in Los Angeles last summer. The chorus is now making a short tour of the Atlantic seaboard, and has included Washington in the itinerary.

Today's program will open with a group of ecclesiastical songs, including the fifteenth-century "Song of the Pilgrims," Bach's motet, "The Spirit Also Helpeth Us" and another composition by the same composer. A second group of nationalistic folk music contains "May Day Carol" (English), "Fjorton Aar" (Swedish), "Carol of the Bells" (Russian), "Se Solens Skjonne Lys" (Norwegian), "Dormi" (Italian), "Come Now Together" (Bavarian) and "Carry Me Back to Old Virginia" (American).

A third group combined Sibelius' "Song of the Shepherd," a traditional Swedish "Ring Danse," Sigurd Lie's "Snow" and Grieg's "Spring." Tickets will be available at Constitution Hall after 10 o'clock this morning.

D. C. Has Nation's Best Research Facilities

The Special Library Resources, lengthy publication of the Special Libraries Association recently issued, reveals that the libraries of agencies and organizations in the District of Columbia offer without doubt the greatest research facilities to be found in any community in the United States.

There are 100 special libraries in the District, and they deal to the most specialized degree with such diversified subjects as the history of the Catholic Church and the history of the Republican Party.

The volume lists and classifies the libraries that are known to most people—such as the Library of Congress, the Nationaal Geographic Society Library, and the library of the Department of Agriculture—and also those that are known mainly to scholars and research workers in specialized fields, such as the library of the Freer Gallery of Art and the collection of economic and technical material on mining industries in the library of the Bureau of Mines in the Interior Department.

In the mind of the layman, the Library of Congress stands out. It was set up in 1800 as a library for the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and it provides them with their reference background. But few people outside of the field know that in its diversion of aeronautics it has the largest collection of material on aeronautics, a collection that is regarded as comprising most of the extant literature on the subject. Only specialized scholars are likely to know that its Hispanic Foundation, a new division opened in 1939, contains a 100,000 volume collection on Hispanic America, Portuguese and Spanish arts and customs, and the general Spanish arts, crafts, culture and history. The casual visitor also is likely to leave without learning that this library has more than 200,000 volumes on East Asiatic languages, many of them unusual and rare.

Archives Invaluable

The National Archives is invaluable to the student, as it has the records of Government that have ceased to be of current use to their respective agencies. The delver into early American history and Government finds a happy hunting ground here. If the student is going far afield, he will find material covering description, discovery and exploration in all parts of the world in the library of the National Geographic Society.

For local history, the student should go to the Public Library of the District of Columbia where there is a large collection of Washingtoniana, invaluable source material on local history. In the Smithsonian Institution, in addition to the Freer Gallery of Art, there is extensive material on archeology and early North American culture, and a noteworthy collection on military history and the life and times of Napoleon.

The Department of Agriculture library has 300,000 volumes, regarded as the most comprehensive collection on agriculture in the world, and the Labor Department's library also is considered the best in the field. The War Department's Army Medical Library, established in 1836, now possesses what is thought to be the largest collection of medical literature in the world.

Among the other special libraries in the District, and their contents, are the following: the Geological Survey Library of the Department of the Interior, a comprehensive working library covering all geologic sciences—the largest geological library in the United States; the Municipal Reference Service library of the Bureau of the Census, documentary material from States, cities, and counties—invaluable to researchers in local administration; library of the Assistant Secretary of War, formerly the library of the Army Industrial College, specializing in economic warfare, with comprehensive collection on the first World War.

Navy Library

The Office of Naval Records and library of the Navy Department maintains a comprehensive collection of volumes of naval biography including 47 items on John Paul Jones.

In the Patent Office of the Department of Commerce is a technical library with an unexcelled collection of foreign and domestic patents and patent journals.

In the field of international relations are two outstanding libraries: that of the Department of State which maintains an extensive collection of diplomatic correspondence of leading nations, and the Library of Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Among the university libraries, that of Catholic University of America is know for its special collection on South American history and travel and for the private library of Pope Clement XI, an important collection of early church history and incunabula. Georgetown University also has a large collection of early Catholic Americana. Howard University is known for its Moorland Foundation collection on Negro life and history.

The documents office library of the Government Printing Office keeps a complete file of all publications issued by the Federal Government and prepares all official catalogs and indexes of Government publications.

The office of education library of Federal Security Agency is an extensive collection covering all phases of education, foreign and domestic. In the same agency is the public health service library covering all phases of public health, and with a particularly strong collection on the venereal diseases.

In the Federal Housing Administration is an unusual collection of all real property survey data, much of which can be found no where else

And in the library of Federal Works Agency is an expanding collection of materials on protective construction.

Science Begins Investigation Of Diseases of Old Age

By G. B. Lal

International News Service Science Editor

New York, April 12.—Discovery of significant new clews about the influence of temperature, noise and other outside conditions upon the aging of the body was revealed today.

In the light of the new findings special research pertaining to old age in human beings is expected to be conducted.

Physicians and hygienists will find the following facts discovered by Drs. L. P. Herrington and Jean H. Nelbach, of the J. B. Pierci Laboratory of Hygiene, in New Haven, Conn., particularly suggestive from the point of view of man.

Rats, especially bred in the laboratories from known strains, were used for the experiments.

Drs. Herrington and Nelbach found that there was a most important relationship between the condition of the great blood vessel, the aorta which serves as the main channel for arterial blood circulation, and the rate of aging.

In old age, the aorta loses its "tensibility," its elasticity or stretching power. As aging proceeds, this tensile strength decreases. Exact measurements of this change were made with a special apparatus.

At any given age, and body weight, it was found that the aorta could be rendered less tensile by these conditions:

High temperature of the cage, 95 degrees fahrenheit.

Nervous disturbances, such as produced by incessant noises.

Feeding large amounts of thyroid extract which caused upsetting of the body's "metabolism," rate of heat production.

When the temperature of the cage was kept down to 65 degrees Fahrenheit, the aorta of the adult animal was found to have a high tensile strength like that of a rather young rat.

At 83 degrees, the strength of the blood vessel was found to be intermediate, neither as great as at 65, nor as low as at 95 degrees Fahrenheit.

Thus, "air conditioning," regulation of temperature of the cage, was found to influence the main artery of blood circulation, probably through alterations of the endocrine glands, particularly the gonads. All rats used were males.

The Bridge Deck

By Florence Osborn

Leaping from one to six has been considered for some time as completely lacking in bidding finesse, and few masters would think of bidding six without four or five rounds of delicate exchanges of information. But Charles Goren, one of the few champions to make a success at teaching bridge, gives heart to all high jumpers by indorsing such tactics when the occasion demands.

OSBORN

"I am persuaded that the science of slam bidding is being worked overtime," he says. "I, ffor one, enjoy witnessing good boxing matches, but every once in a while I like to see a couple of tough boys just slug it out. And there are any number of hands that respond favorably to that sort of treatment. One of that type occurred in the finals of the national team-of-four championship at Richmond."

Goren's cards:

♠ A 2
♡ A K 10 9 6
◇ A 7 5 4 3

"I opened the bidding with one heart. My partner, Sidney Silodor, responded with two diamonds. I felt that this was not the type of hand for delicate treatment. I wasn't sure we could make six. I wasn't sure that we could make seven, but I was sure that I was not going to help the defense and I was willing to take my chances on a slam contract. So I bid six diamonds."

Here are the complete hands:

	♠ 4 3 ♡ J 5 3 ◇ K Q J 6 ♣ A J 10 5
♠ K Q 10 8 ♡ Q 8 7 4 ◇ 8 2 ♣ 7 3 2	NORTH WEST EAST SOUTH	♠ J 9 7 6 5 ♡ 2 ◇ 10 9 ♣ K Q 9 8 4
	♠ A 2 ♡ A K 10 9 6 ◇ A 7 5 4 3 ♣ 6

East opened the king of clubs and the slam was made, declarer winning the club ace, drawing trumps and setting up the heart suit for discards, giving up only one trick to the heart queen. A spade opening will defeat six, as declarer must give up a heart trick, and when he does so, West will also cash a spade.

"I had decided against a fake jump in spades for two reasons," says Goren, explaining why he did not make the obvious phychic bid. "First, that partner might not catch on in time and get me overboard, and second, that it would afford West the opportunity to double if from his holding he could suspect horse thievery."

At the CHESS TABLE

by WILLARD MUTCHLER

Arrangements for staging the record-breaking 100-board simultaneous exhibition by Grandmaster Reuben Fine are proceeding apace. Joint sponsors of the event are the Capital City Chess Club, the Chess Divan, I. S. Turover, W. K. Wimsatt, sr., and the Federal Chess Club. The working committee in charge of arrangements consists of William H. Nicholas, of Capital City C. C., who first projected the plans for the mammoth affair; Norval P. Wigginton, of Chess Divan, and Hyman Bronfin, of Federal C. C.

Thanks to the cooperation of the National Press Club, play will be held in the commodious ballroom of that organization. The date of play will be Sunday, May 3, when Fine will commence his herculean efforts promptly at 2:30 p. m. And, since Fine ranks as one of the world's most rapid and accurate masters, he may be expected to dispose of his collective opponents within a reasonably short time.

Each contestant will be presented with a memorial souvenir program appropriate for the record-shattering event. The program will contain Fine's photograph, a sketch of his career, a game score-card, and will be autographed by the master. Each player who defeats Fine will become the proud recipient of an autographed copy of his recently published classic, "Basic Chess Endings."

Tickets are now on sale and are priced at $1 per contestant. Tickets and board-space are numbered and strictly reserved. Ergo, every player who wishes to exercise his privilege of participating and to cooperate in establishing a new local, and perhaps world record for simultaneous play, is urged to procure his ticket at once. Tickets may be obtained from Mr. Nicholas, 122 Chevy Chase Drive, Chevy Chase, Md. Telephone Wisconsin 2884; Mr. Wigginton, 6217 Fourth Street Northwest. Georgia 0234; Mr. Bronfin, 3001 Stephenson Place Northwest, Ordway 2880; the Capital Ctiy Chess Club, Hotel Gordon; the Chess Divan, Parkside Hotel; the Federal C. C., 2437 Fifteenth Street Northwest, on Tuesday evenings; or from your chess editor, 4819 Forty-seventh Street Northwest, Woodley 2870. Early purchases not only afford personal assurance of accommodations, but will aid greatly in distributing the committees gargantuan tasks of arrangements.

Chessmaster Fine, incidentally, has again emerged with another classic in authorship. His new book is titled "Chess the Easy Way" and presents the fundamentals of the game in a strikingly original manner. Although intended primarily for the inexperienced player, strong players will welcome its concise, logical and unique recording of the principles of play. In a delightfully informal style Fine leaves the reader with a sense of having received personal instructions, of having painlessly been impressed with an authoritative knowledge of basic procedures. Following lucid explanations of the moves, rules, notation, checkmating the king, and discussions of the three basic principles of force, mobility and safety, Fine gives the student ten fundamental rules to govern his opening play, ten for his mid-game, and ten for the end-game. And, more important, shows simply how, why, and when each is applied. As a practical teacher of chess, the volume is without a peer. It may be procured from the local bookshops at a cost of $1.50, or direct from publisher David McKay, of Philadelphia.

The District championship tournament entered its opening round last night at the Chess Divan with H. Bronfin in the role of tournament director. Second round play occurs at the Capital City C. C. this Friday evening, and the public is invited to witness the play without cost.

Capital City's latest events in its point award program, which nets participants $10 worth of chess equipment, were a kriegspiel team match, and a simultaneous exhibition by master Newell W. Banks. The kriegspiel match resulted thus:

Team A.	W.	Team B.	W.
M. C. Stark	½	C. W. Stark	1½
M. L. Rosedale	0	W. H. Mutchler	2
H. Shelton	1	F. O. Vosburgh	0
R. L. Perry	1	D. Floyd	0
S. Schwartz	2	T. J. Buford	0
	4½		3½

Banks maintained his remarkable local record as an exhibitor by again going undefeated. T. J. Buford managed to gain a draw, but Banks defeated G. M. Wilson, R. G. Burrington, C. S. Pierpoint, M. K. Rosedale, L. Minkoff, C. S. Reily and W. H. Nicholas for a 7½ to ½ score at chess. At checkers Banks defeated George Vidlak, J. J. Crocoley, twice trounced K. Ford, and twice drew with namesake Andrew J. Banks, who played host to the master during his stay here. Event No. 9 in the Point Award program will occur at the Capital City Club on Saturday at 8 p. m. and consist of skittles tourneys with all games being King's Gambits.

Chess Divan recently featured four-handed chess in which partners D. H. Mugridge and H. V. Klein won and lost to J. Richman and E. M. Schara, while partners C. H. Tallman and G. B. Jones defeated B. Goldberg and R. H. Kinter. Wednesday evening the Divan will feature rapid transit tourneys, and the public is invited.

Play in its several club tourneys will continue at the Federal C. C. on Tuesday evening. In the championship fray the standings read:

Player.	W.	L.	Player.	W.	L.
Nash	1½	½	Holleroft	½	1½
Karson	1½	½	Skrally	½	1½
Lloyd	1	1

Getting off to his customary start in the first of the National Press Club's annual bridge tournaments, which began last Monday, C. E. Stewart shattered every precedent in a game that usually deals harshly with defending champs, by winning the John Edwards Trophy for the fourth consecutive time. Judge Stewart played with Mrs. Paul E. Golden, the event was the contest for mixed pairs, known in club parlance as "Mr. and Mrs." pairs; it was held in the auditorium of the national clubhouse.

Defenders of trophies occasionally do crash through, and a District foursome once held the Virginia State team championship for three years, but until last week this reporter never met a four-times champ. Hats off to the judge!

Runners-up to Stewart-Golden were Dr. A. O'Donnell and Mrs. Jack Bennett; Frank B. Lord and Mrs. Jean Ellis placed third. The male partners' names are given first in this listing since they are members of the club. Years ago the games committee made a rule that nonmembers might play only in partnership with a member. Several other rules have been revoked, like the ban against nonmembers who possessed master points, but the member-in-a-partnership restriction still is rigidly enforced. The Press Club never ran an open duplicate game.

The John Edwards Trophy is the permanent possession of the club, winners merely obtaining custody for a year. It belongs in a collection that in intrinsic value is equal to the Washington Bridge League's, while in interest it exceeds any trophy collection in Washington. The Mexican Ambassador, Marvin McIntyre, secretary to President Roosevelt, Ely Culbertson, Victor Smith and E. Hall Downes are among the other donors with John Edwards; the club playing no favorites but accepting trophies from statesmen and bridge experts alike.

Next week the Victor Smith Cup goes into play; a tournament will be held every Monday evening thereafter until the entire collection has been won. The club's season closes with an evening devoted to the formal presentation of trophies to the current champs.

Positively the last chance to qualify for the Washington Bridge League team annuals comes next Wednesday, April 15.

The league's annual business meeting and election of officers takes place some time this month, but so far no definite date has been set.

Playing on April 1 in the league's Corley Challenge Cup series the team of Mr. and Mrs. James H. Lemon, L. R. Watson, jr., Alvin Roth and Louis Newman made its sixth win on the trophy, defeating the foursome of Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Stockvis, Leroy Thurtell and E. H. Roorbach. While the exact number of cumulative points by which a team wins is never made public in the challenge matches, it is rumored the Lemons had a smashing victory. Mrs. Stockvis reports that law doesn't mix well with bridge. The titian-haired young feminine bridge expert was recently admitted to the District bar.

With six wins on the Corley Cup (which gives the team only four to go) the Lemons take on the Clifford, Veerhoff, Lake, Elliott foursome in the challenge round next week. Two teams that forfeited by nonappearance at the last match now must start from scratch. They are the Surguy and the Reddy teams.

A meeting of the executive committee of the Women's Auxiliary of the Washington Bridge League has been called for Tuesday, April 14, at 10:30 a. m. in the home of President Mrs. D. E. Stephan, at 1355 Euclid Street. Members of this committee are urged to be present as matters of importance must be settled before the annual meeting and election of officers on May 7. Prominent on the agenda is the disposition of the auxiliary's "Gift of the Month" for April. Funds collected during March will be donated to the Navy Relief Society.

The auxiliary held an open game on Wednesday, April 8.

Now drawing towards the close of its team season, the Federal Bridge League at present is lead by the W. P. A. line-up of Mr. and Mrs. W. de St. Aubin, Mrs. B. Palmer and Lewis Tubbs. This quartette has won 119½ matches during the current half, giving the team a margin of 14½ boards over the Lions foursome, which won the first half. Mrs. Frederick Eberson, Charles Lyons, Dr. C. C. McDonnell and R. E. Marsh make up the Lions team. Third place in the league is held by the Federalites, Schmidl, Whitten, Mullen and Koster, with 104 boards, only one match under the Lions. These results are after the game of April 7.

Winners in the Federal monthly master point game for March were Mrs. Irene Surguy and Gene Hermann, with Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Rossen, runnersup. The third pair was made up by Dr. A. J. Steinberg and Louis Newman, it was Dr. Steinberg's first appearance for many weeks. Caught in the toils of a doctor-shortage the Steinbergs were unable to defend the mixed championship of the Old Dominion.

Opening of the Masters' Individual Tournament Friday, at the Park Central Hotel in New York, calls to mind by its very dissimilarity that great free-for-all, the World Bridge Olympic, which was played every April for the past ten years. But 1942 will be minus an Olympic! Former competitors may obtain the prepared hands as a souvenir of our times. The dictators cast a shadow in far off corners of the world. Organized bridge was at loggerheads with Herr Hitler since 1936 when the Anschluss annihilated Austria as an independent state. A Vienna team then held the bridge championship of the world—the Nazis prevented the team from taking part in the next international match.

International games became impossible shortly afterwards, now the Olympic closes shop; the American Contract Bridge League's all-out war effort is more than vague patriotism for its roots are firmly planted in the fertile soil of a personal grievance.

Veterans Groups Join To Aid War Effort

Delegates of several national veterans' organizations, affiliated with the recently-formed National Council of American Veteran Organizations, will meet today in the board room of the Veterans' Administration Building to formulate plans for joint aid to the nation's war effort. The meeting begins at 10 a. m.

Also present will be official representatives of the War and Navy Departments, the War Production Board, the Office of Civilian Defense, the Veterans' Administration and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who will offer suggestions as to how the veterans groups can best contribute toward the winning of the war.

The National Commander of the Disabled American Veterans, Maj. Laurence R. Melton of Dallas, Tex., will preside as chairman of the council. Thomas Walsh of New York City, National Commander of the Catholic War Veterans, is the vice chairman of the committee, and Joe Barr, official representative of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, is treasurer. Millard W. Rice, national service director of the D. A. V., is executive secretary of the council.

Several national veterans' groups, which may not become affiliated with the National Council because of restrictions in their constitutions, are expected to send official observers to the meeting.

At a meeting of the council held recently in Washington, a resolution was submitted to Maj. Melton, adopted by the Advisory Council, and sent to the Federal Security Agency. The resolution urges taking an inventory of the manpower of primary and secondary occupational skills throughout the Nation. Under the resolution plan the poll of skill would be taken through the Selective Service System, and the completed forms would then be turned over to local employment offices for immediate use in recruiting workers for the war industries.

Recent action of the Marine Corps Reserve in accepting the re-enlistments of former veterans, including those suffering from service-connected disabilities, will be of much interest to veterans and to the council. The specific regulations, issued by the Marine Corps under public law 408, are as follows: Men over 30 and under 50 years of age, who are able to meet the reduced physical requirements, but not qualified for combat duty, may be enlisted in the Marine Corps Reserve, Class IV. Recruiting officers will exercise extreme care in the selection of these men, and, while a number of physical defects will be waived, the men must be of high caliber and in good standing in their communities. Enlistments will be for the duration of the war.

In compliance with a proclamation by National Commander Melton, the departments and chapters of the D. A. V. participated in Army Day parades and exercises last Monday throughout the country.

There will be a special meeting of the "Sons," who are requested to bring some other son of a veteran, at 8 p. m.

National Cathedral Post

The post meeting on April 28 will be held at the American Legion Club. Commander Buckley has secured as guest speaker Capt. Delli Chandhri, military attache of agency general of the government of India. As a cavalry officer, Capt. Chandhri has seen actual service in the Middle East and other theaters of the present war.

Dept. of Agriculture Unit

The next regular monthly meeting of the United States Department of Agriculture Unit, American Legion Auxiliary, will be held at the American Legion headquarters, 2437 Fifteenth Street Northwest, next Wednesday evening, April 15, at 8 p. m. All members are requested to attend.

Sons of the Legion

A large group, including legionnaires and their families, plan to visit the camp site today if the weather permits. The group will meet in front of the home of Gail T. Judd, 411 Eighteenth Street Southeast, at 1 p. m. A motor carvan will proceed from there to the 212-acre tract of land on the West River near Back Bay, Md.

As a result of careful deliberations at the meetings of the detachment commission and squadron commanders, it was decided to plan and base future activities, including those at camp, on age groupings. Detachment Commander C. Victor Dessez stated that consideration will also be given to methods of groupings by sections of the city, for specific activities, which may supplement and help increase the membership and interest in the individual squadrons.

Plans are being made for a dance to be held for the benefit of the detachment. Legionnaires and their friends will be urged to attend and support the dance. The dance will also help the Detachment Drum and Bugle Corps, which needs new instruments.

The corps rehearses in the armory at Roosevelt High School, Tuesday evenings at 6:30 o'clock.

All candidates for the softball team please contact Charles Heller, Georgia 2832, evenings. Candidates must be 16 years of age or older.

A WEEKEND REVIEW OF CURRENT PUBLICATIONS

'O Brave New World!'

By Juan Piedra

MESSRS. J. Donald Kingsley and David Petegorsky, two young social scientists of the staff of Antioch College have made a penetrating analysis of the causes of the world-wide conflict, a critique of the methods now employed to win the struggle, a formulation of a more effective program of action, and, above all, an outline of a future goal.

Though they nowhere state in precise terms their own political and economic philosophy, it is made none the less abundantly clear throughout that they regard the present conflict as having its origin principally in economic causes. Fascism, to them, is no historical accident, the mere brainchild of madmen, but the logical and ineluctable consequence of the last stages of monopoly capitalism, having its roots in "an economy of scarcity and a system of organized privilege and inequality." A definite historical period, they contend, is coming to an end, with fascism representing its agonizing, desperate attempts to cling to life. What is required to win the war as well as the peace is the realization that we are in the midst of "a vast revolution that is tranforming the traditional patterns of human relationships and social institutions," and consequently all our thinking must be directed towards the future.

A mere military victory without a corresponding fundamental, drastic reorganization of the social and economic order on a worldwide scale would constitute a definite assurance of the recurrence of the present disaster after a brief interlude of time. Indeed, "nothing else will suffice." The current proposals for the establishment, during the postwar period, of international boards of trade, monetary schemes, and the like, they regard as primarily political reforms, and consequently as inadequate. Democracy, to them, represents "the deepest aspirations of humanity," and the common people, they are convinced, if given a faith to fight for, will not only win the war, but possess in addition the ability, under proper guidance, to shape their destiny as well. The primary article of their creed is that "with vision, courage, and energy we can make our future." Pronouncements such as the Atlantic Charter, they feel, are too "vague and meaningless" to arouse the oppressed peoples as well as the underprivileged in the free countries to a determined struggle against fascism. A charter setting forth in considerable detail the outlines of the society of tomorrow is an indispensable weapon in both war and peace. Their aspirations are best stated in their own words:

ALBERT GUERARD

After nationalism "cultural pluralism"

"The basic elements of that society, as we envisage them, are: a planned economic order in which our vast resources are made available for the wellbeing of the people; the recognition of human need rather than profit or power as the guiding principles of social policy; the refusal to recognize any limitations but those of resources, skills or knowledge to these continuous extensions of the frontiers of human welfare; adequate assurance of social, economic, and political equality to all races and creeds with equally effective protection for their cultural and religious freedoms; the creation of an international order that will reduce to a minimum the possibility of future wars . . . To develop political forms that really give expression to the interdependence of all nations; to establish economic relationships that will liberate our potentialities from the straitjackets of privilege and class interest by which they have been bound; to make certain that those forms and relationships will operate to give fuller substance to the concepts of democracy and freedom."

No real, durable peace can be established without giving effect to these postulates, nor could these be realized without the cooperation of the United States, Great Britain, Soviet Russia and China.

The authors can scarcely be accused of political naivete. They realize that the implementation of such an ambitious program would require resolute leadership, technical ability, and wide mass support in the shape of political parties. They are particularly concerned with the problem of proper leadship, which hitherto has been recruited from the ranks of the privileged classes, whom they distrust. Consequently they exhort the intellectuals to abandon their ivory towers, identify themselves with the masses, and provide the necessary dynamic intellectual leadership.

Leaving apparently all other countries to work out their particular destinies, the authors recommend for the United States the formation of a progressive party to be composed of labor, professional groups, farmers. The New Deal reforms they consider totally inadequate both for the present and the future. All talk, further, of an "American Century" and a "managerial revolution" they decidedly regard as pleas for the retention of privilege in disguised forms.

The volume includes also chapters by Pierre Cot, Max Werner, Albert Guerard, Oscar I. Janowsky, and Mordecai Ezekiel, on some phases of postwar reconstruction. These chapters represent talks delivered before the "Antioch Conference on Progressive Action and Post-War Reconstruction," held in June, 1941. Cot summarizes, in effect, the proposals of Streit and associates. Werner proposes the establishment of an international military police. Guerard and Janowsky arrive at the identical conclusion that with the passing of the sovereign, national state the problem of minorities will be solved through the expedient of cultural pluralism. Mordecai Ezekiel reverts to his favorite topic of the possibility of the life abundant within the greatly modified framework of present-day society.

As an aid to the understanding of the true character of the present crisis this volume is invaluable. The inquiry probes deeply, searchingly, unsparingly. As a program of action it is somewhat less satisfactory, though its statement of the goal to be sought in order to insure a lasting peace is as admirably formulated as it is far-reaching and all-embracing.

"STRATEGY FOR DEMOCRACY," by J. Donald Kingsley and David W. Petegorsky. (Longmans, Green, $3.)

How The Japs Propose To Beat Us

Two Years Ago Mr. Matsuo Explained It All

By Robert E. Runser

MONTHS AGO there was some rumor and gossip here in Washington about a "secret document" which was supposed to disclose the exact line of attack the Japanese army and navy would (and subsequently did) take against the United States. We know now that what was meant was a book published openly enough at Tokyo in 1940 under the title, "The Three Power Alliance and the U. S.-Japanese War."

Mr. Kilsoo K. Haan, a Korean nationalist, managed by secret and devious means to purloin a copy of the book brought to California by two Japanese officers who were members of the notorious Black Dragon society, the religio-political organization which for some time has been the de facto government of Japan. Mr. Haan made the contents of the book known to various United States Government departments, including the Army and Navy, many weeks before the attack on Pearl Harbor.

The present volume is Mr. Haan's unabridged translation of the book. It gives one Kinoaki Matsuo's conception of what the Pacific war would be like, and what will be its result.

ACCORDING to Mr. Matsuo, the United States is solely to blame for the United States-Japanese crisis. Jealous and nervous about our possessions in the Pacific, we naturally hated the powerful though peace-loving Japanese. We are, it seems, extremely imperialistic, ready to grab anything which might fall in our way, such as the many islands bases in the Atlantic and Caribbean which we stole from the British under the pretext of offering aid. Moreover, the United States has a black record in China where we tried to thwart Japan's altruistic plan of coprosperity for the Oriental races. To top this off, we were building the largest fleet in the world, dickering for additional spheres of influence in the Pacific, and were conscripting our citizens for a huge army under the pretext of National Defense when it was generally known that our military forces were already more than adequate to protect our shores. Obviously, then, the United States was making ready for a big land grab and the finger pointed at innocent Japan. So much for the casus belli, as envisaged by Mr. Matsuo.

"Japan," says Mr. Matsuo, "is a country entirely different from the aggressive United States. For her history to date has not even a single page showing that she has encroached upon other countries." But things had already come to a pretty pass. Despite many concessions in favor of peace, Japan, unless she acted quickly, was doomed to fall before the military and capitalistic power of the United States. Her one salvation lay in joining the Three Power Alliance, that agreement among the underlings of the world which promised to put an end to the imperialistic capitalism to assure a cooperative and peaceful world.

With the moral support of Germany and Italy, the fateful shadow that hovered over Japan became less grim, but nevertheless war was still inevitable. When it came, what would be Japan's plan of operation? Kinoaki Matsuo, doffing his disguise of outraged idealism becomes most sober and realistic in his ideas on this point. He analyzes the naval and military strength of the United States and shows how these would be used against Japan. The United States would immediately assume the offensive, send fleets and expeditionary forces to her Pacific possessions, blockade Japan, and commence raiding the Japanese mainland.

Unless Japan could frustrate such an offensive, she would be doomed. Her alternative was to take the offensive herself. A surprise-attack fleet could be dispatched to the United States Pacific Coast and to the Panama Canal to destroy or weaken the United States Fleet as soon as it departed on its Japanese mission. While Japanese trade was being protected in the China and Japan Seas, submarines would be sent to raid on the United States Atlantic Coast, to create a diversion and so hold the Atlantic Fleet in the Atlantic. Russia could be wooed into at least armed neutrality and the Philippine Islands swiftly occupied.

FOLLOWING the Philippine occupation, Hongkong, Singapore and the Dutch Indies—all vulnerable to Japanese attack—would be taken solely to keep them from being used as American naval bases. Forced to use Hawaii, which is actually a little too far away, as a base against Japan, the United States Fleet would concentrate there. Then the Japanese would launch a surprise attack and cripple our fleet while submarines would play havoc with shipping and lines of communication on the Pacific Coast.

Further surprises would await the remnant of the United States Fleet on its way to Japan. Small Jap naval forces would whittle away at our fleet without offering open battle. Through such tactics, the American force would be severely damaged, dispersed, or even destroyed by the courageous Japanese navy and by the Japanese air force which "would show a courage a hundred times higher than ordinary."

Only by the greatest bit of luck could the United States hope to break through the Japanese cordon. Our great losses, so Mr. Matsuo thought, would force us to drop offensive tactics and to withdraw. In so doing we would undoubtedly give up Hawaii or else leave it in such a weak state that it could be taken by the Japanese, though not without great cost. So, too, the Panama Canal, which if necessary to the Japanese victory, could be destroyed or taken. Swept from the seas and driven from her territories in the Pacific, the United States could only give up the struggle and promise thereafter to mind her own business. Japan would thus "see her great ideal realized" and have a free hand in the Far East.

THIS EXTRAORDINARY testament by an officer of the Japanese naval intelligence had as its purpose the winning of Japanese support for the Japanese militarists. It was evidently an attempt to convince conservative members of the admiralty that a war with the United States was not necessarily an act of suicide. Some of the pictures the author draws have been justified by events.

Thus it gives us some reason to ponder about the value of the work as a blueprint of what is yet to come. However, the book is written in pretty general terms, which may account for its correspondence with events. It was not a secret document, at least in Japan, nor does it appear to bear any official indorsement. Interesting as it is, this book is scarcely a reason for further alarm or any special blame for those who knew about this work prior to December 7, 1941.

Other Informative Books About Our Pacific Enemy

MR. H. J. TIMPERLEY'S "Japan: a World Problem" places its emphasis upon the psychological, rather than upon the economic, forces. Mr. Timperley, an Australian by birth, has spent 20 years in the Far East and is at present an adviser to the National Government of China. He believes that "megalomaniacal ideas have been working in the blood of the Japanese, not merely for generations but for centuries," and proves it with historical examples. Bushido, the Mikado myth, even, the direct patterning of Japan's political institutions upon those Western models which were the least democratic fall into this framework of a planned national psychosis. Add to all this the ancient dreams of Hideyoshi concerning world empire, and the feudal traditions which have dominated the Japanese mind and you have a definite line which traces back through four centuries the motivating forces behind Japanese policy.

Mr. Timperley's volume is offered as an analysis of the Japanese problem and, although he subscribes to certain beliefs as to what must be done when the war is over to see that Japan does not resume her imperialism and aggression, he has little or nothing to offer as to how meanwhile we may defeat her. He leaves that little problem to the military strategists.

MR. WILFRED FLEISHER, former editor of the Japan Advertiser and present Washington correspondent for the New York Herald Tribune, gives us another background book on Japan. His is the first to offer a fair guide to the economic, military and political strength of our Far Eastern enemy. It begins with Commodore Perry's visit to the islands in 1853 and closes with a summary of the fateful Washington negotiations of 1941. The author shows the steady rise of Japan into world empire and into a great military power during the intervening 88 years. He analyzes Japan's relationships with other countries, especially Germany, and shows how these have been instrumental in shaping Japanese policy. He explains why she is now reaching forth in a final hope of seizing enough territory to secure her of the resources and materials necessary for her existence. Mr. Fleisher's belief is that, although Japan's frenzied drive has carried her farther along the road of conquest than was thought possible, her successes must be quickly consolidated or she is lost.

Tales And Tellers

By John T. Appleby

PETER FLEMING, in the introduction to his latest book of short stories, "A Story to Tell," points out that short stories in general may be divided into stories proper, in which the emphasis is primarily upon the plot, and sketches of character and of atmosphere, in which "a climax has come to be regarded as unnecessary, and an unexpected climax as downright vulgar."

Following this distinction, the 13 tales that Mr. Fleming presents are indeed proper stories, after the classical model, depending for much of their effectiveness upon the twist or jolt at the end. Mr. Fleming has indeed a story to tell, and tells it with great relish. Some of his stories are macabre, some pungently witty, and one of them, "The Kill," should take its place among the masterpieces dealing with werewolves. Except for "Our Hero," which wears the labored air of a potboiler, the stories in this collection are eminently readable and entertaining. If you like Maupassant and O. Henry and Maugham, whom he most closely resembles, you'll like "A Story to Tell."

ON THE OTHER HAND, the 17 short stories in Mr. Farrell's collection, "$1000 a Day," are little more than sketches. One of them, "Sorel," reads like a rough outline for a novel based on the life of a French fascist. Another, "Yesterday's Love," is a Dorothy-Parker-like telephone monologue by a young wench whose boy friend has married another girl. "Getting Out the Vote for the Working Class," one of the best of the lot, deals with the efforts of a group of boozing Bohemians to get to the polls and vote for the Communist Party.

Mr. Farrell returns to his favorite theme and private preserve, the rebellion of the younger generation of Irish-Americans against the ways and particularly the faith of their elders, in "Monday Is Another Day" and "The Only Son," both of which read like excerpts from "Studs Lonigan." In his constant preoccupation with young Catholics who leave the church, Mr. Farrell would seem at first glance to be an American counterpart of James Joyce. The similarity, however, is only superficial. "Dubliners" and "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Men" both present a violent rebellion against the church, but that rebellion has an intellectual basis. Joyce and his characters protest against the dogma of the church as such. Mr. Farrell's rebellious young men, however, have no such intellectual grounds. They revolt against the whole scheme of their parents' lives, for which they have nothing but contempt, and they reject the church merely because it is an integral part of those lives from which they separate themselves.

Finally, Mr. Farrell presents what seem to be a couple of sketches for a novel centering around the life of a filling station attendant. "The Fate of a Hero" introduces one Peters, who insists on fighting hold-up men instead of surrendering the company's cash to them. Peters is referred to again in "Accident," a story of a pair of attendants who lacked Peters' sturdy honesty.

I yield to no one in my admiration of Mr. Farrell as a novelist. Those very elements, however, which contribute most to the effectiveness of his novels are the same ones which make this collection of short stories disappointing. Mr. Farrell is at his best when he is working on a big canvass, in which he can pile up detail after detail, none of them very dramatic in itself, to produce an effect of great realism. Those little details, however, which are so effective as brush strokes in the larger portrait, fail in their effect when they are presented in the isolation of a short story.

RALPH BATES

Author of "The Undiscoverables"

RALPH BATES, whose novels of Spanish and Mexican life are among the best in English, is the author of three long short stories published under the title of "The Undiscoverables." The title story deals with the heroic activities of the anti-Fascist fishermen and peasants of Sicily during the week following Italy's entry into the war. Cesare Maniscalco, the mandolinist and goat-herder was considered a loud-mouth braggart by his fellows. When war was declared, however, and the Fascist officials filled the town with their corruptions and tyrannies, Cesare took to the familiar hills and waged a one-man sabotage campaign. His two sons, Carmelo and Brasi, took up the fight, too, although it led in the end to the death of all three of them.

"The Undiscoverables" invites comparison with John Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down," which deals somewhat with the same theme. But where Steinbeck is sentimental, Ralph Bates is coldly realistic. Mr. Bates has seen enough during the Spanish Civil War, in which he fought on the Loyalist side, to know that all Mr. Steinbeck's fine words about the conquered people really winning in the end are fine words and nothing more. "The Undiscoverables" are killed because they are outnumbered. The emphasis of the story is not on the justice and nobility of their cause with all the sentimentality that this involves when it is implied that justice and nobility will take the place of arms and numbers, but on the courage and skill with which they wage their hopeless warfare. The Maniscalcos, father and sons, knew quite well that they could not overcome all the Fascists on the island, but they intended to account for as many of them as possible before the inevitable end.

The second story, "The Burning Corn," is the tale of a Mexican village, groping after the gains of the Revolution, and its stand against an attack by the reactionaries.

Finally, Mr. Bates introduces a new note in "When the Man Comes, Follow Him," a mystery story of the first order. Mr. Bates has revealed an unsuspected talent in this field, but I, for one, hope that he is not tempted to follow up this success. The woods are full of good writers of detective stories, whereas Ralph Bates has a unique ability in presenting the Mexican scene to English readers.

The Plain Dealer's First 100 Years

By Coleman Rosenberger

The Plain Dealer, one of the great newspapers of the country, marked the completion of 100 years of publication in January, 1942, and for more than a third of that 100 years Archer H. Shaw has been a member of its staff. It is not difficult to understand, then, if Mr. Shaw's history of the paper has something of both the intimacy and the reverence which might be found in a biographer's life of a distinguished relative.

Mr. Shaw has written a thorough and detailed history, and in putting down the scenes and the characters in the long story of the Plain Dealer's development from woodcuts to wirephotos—here is the desk which was used by Artemus Ward, and what did Dickens say when he came to Cleveland? —he has set down much of the stuff of the spirit of America.

When the Cleveland Advertiser, which had been scraping along for ten years, was bought by two brothers and rechristened the Plain Dealer in 1842, Cleveland was a town of some 7000 inhabitants. Pigs rooted in the roadsides, and the main street was a mudhole after every rain. The city was not to see its first railroad train for another seven years, and, to judge from a contemporary print of the Cuyahoga River which the author reproduces, sailboats were still withstanding the incursion of steam.

The city, however, was already well supplied with newspapers. In addition to the weekly Plain Dealer, there were seven dailies and weeklies, including one which bore up under the name Eagle-Eyed News Catcher. That the Plain Dealer outlived and outgrew its competitors was due largely to the ability of the younger of the two founders, Joseph William Gray, who had been a school teacher and lawyer.

In three years the weekly Plain Dealer became a daily. J. W. Gray, says the author, was a new experience in editors for Cleveland. Gray loved a fight and, as the editor of a Democratic paper in Cleveland, he had ample opportunity for his pugnacity. Libel suits were frequent. One of the most noteworthy was in 1857 when Gray successfully defended himself against a $10,000 suit brought by Horace Greely.

Gray continued as editor for 20 years, until his death in 1862. Unhappily for the success of the Plain Dealer the administrator of the Gray estate took over the active editorial control of the paper. The new editor supported Vallandingham (of whom Gray had written, "There is no doubt but his sympathies as well as his associations are with treason") for Governor, and the paper became known as a thoroughly "butternut" (Copperhead) publication. It suspended publication in March, 1865.

The wreckage of the paper was bought two months later by William W. Armstrong, a publisher and former Ohio secretary of state, and the Plain Dealer began another 20-year period of prosperity. Because of the suspension, there was no Plain Dealer to report the two most important events of the time, the surrender at Appomattox and the assassination of Lincoln. The new Plain Dealer appeared just in time to report the capture of Booth.

The Plain Dealer ate a sizeable dish of crow in 1872, when it supported for President "a man whom it had ridiculed, fought in the courts, and generally denounced since its first appearance 30 years earlier"—Horace Greely. Party loyalty, however, prevailed, and it was not until the campaign of 1940 that the Plain Dealer, for the first time, supported other than a Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

The third owner of the Plain Dealer—and in its 100 years it has known but three—was L. E. Holden, who acquired the paper in 1885 and whose estate still owns and operates it. Like Gray, the first editor, Holden was a former teacher and member of the bar. He had made a considerable fortune in mining. For some time after he acquired the paper he gave it little personal attention, but in 1893 he made the editor-in-chief a book reviewer and for a while took over direct control.

It was, however, Elbert Hall Baker, who came to the paper in 1898, and "taking control of the property after it had been steadily losing money for years, gave it new standards, new ideals, a new sense of harmony with its times and its community, set for it a new goal, and by the force of his own character and ability made a new and better 'Plain Dealer' out of the old."

Mr. Shaw's engaging history of the "Plain Dealer's" 100 years will be welcomed not only by the many readers of the "Plain Dealer"—and they are by no means limited to Cleveland or to Ohio—but also by anyone interested in the growth of American journalism and the growth of America.

Life After Death Was Revealed to Her for 20 Years

STEWART EDWARD WHITE

BEFORE Mrs. Stewart Edward White left this life in April, 1939, she—(with her noted husband as an at-first skeptical and later eagerly cooperative companion)—devoted twenty years to exploring, directly, the realm of existence after death.

After her passing, Mrs. White held the many witnessed conversations with her husband which were published a little over a year ago in the book the whole world now knows as The Unobstructed Universe. No other record has given so lucid and detailed a description of what life is like, and means, beyond the barrier.

How the Living Speak with the Dead

Mrs. White — "Betty," to her hosts of friends — kept extensive notes of her communications, instructions and sensations during the whole of that remarkable period. These have now been gathered by Mr. White, together with illuminating descriptions of Betty's personality and mode of life, into the just-published book, THE ROAD I KNOW.

Here is an utterly frank, completely natural record of how one individual sensed her psychic gifts; permitted herself to be instructed in them by those who had gone before; and drew from her exploration not only a deeper understanding of the life to come, but immeasurably greater strength and awareness for living in this phase of our existence.

For the sincerely inquiring reader . . . yes, and for the confirmed skeptic too . . . this book is without a parallel.

Never TRUST LOVE

By PEGGY DERN

Illustrated by William Rook

KIMBALL FORSYTHE came whistling into his stateroom, so glad to be going home again that he didn't in the least mind sharing that small space with three other fellows. After all, with all America-bound ships packed to the bursting point, a guy was lucky not to have to perch in the rigging, he had assured himself cheerfully when he had managed at the last moment to acquire even such cramped accommodations.

The ship was already several hours out at sea. They had sailed a little after midnight. It was almost dawn now but Kim saw that he was the first of the stateroom's occupants to seek slumber.

He went into the tiny bathroom, taking off his coat as he went. He thrust his hand inside the shower curtains to turn on the bath—and jumped back as though he had suddenly been slapped.

His hand, feeling for the water taps, had encountered a feminine arm. Undeniably feminine—warm and round and struggling frantically to release itself from fingers that closed with startled force upon it, dragging its owner out of the protection of the shower curtains, even as the girl gave a gasp.

"Hey, what the devil—" said Kim, staring at the small, blonde girl with tumbled hair above a pallid, heart-shaped face lit by two enormous smoke gray eyes that were sick with terror and pleading.

"A stowaway!" he gasped. "What's the big idea of picking on me?"

"I didn't p-pick on you," stammered the girl. "It is just that I have to get to America, and I have no money—and no passport. So I just came on board with a lot of other people who were saying good-by to friends—and I hid here. I have relatives in America. My mother's people—they will take care of me and give me a home until I can find work."

Kim was touched with pity. She was so little and so frail looking. As though she had never had enough to eat; as though she had lived so long in the shadow of an incredible horror that she was like a little ghost; creeping into the darkness, shrinking from the light, fearful of every sound. Yet the responsibility she was thrusting upon him by hiding herself here in his quarters was disconcerting and most unpleasant to contemplate.

"But see here, if you have relatives in America, you should have gone through the usual channels. The American consulate in your town would have given you the proper papers, a passport—" he began.

"The usual channels?" she repeated, and there was an edge of derision that was very near scorn in her voice. "Have you any idea what that means? There are thousands of people like me—old men, old women, children as well. People who have never committed any crime beyond that of being born and asking the privilege of living and, maybe, even being just a little happy. People who are storming the consulates, standing in long lines for hours, pleading for passports, begging permission to leave a country they once loved but is no longer theirs!"

Kim knew only too well the picture her words sketched. During the last few weeks, since he had been trying to get back to the States, he had seen things that he would never forget.

"Where are your parents?" he asked. Instantly he was sorry that he had spoken, for it was as though a sponge had gone across her face, wiping out even the scant life that it held.

"My father died in a concentration camp. He was not strong." She paused, and when she could speak again she went on breathlessly, "My mother followed him. She didn't want to live without him—and she couldn't—"

"I'm terribly sorry," Kim said gently. "These relatives of yours in America—they wouldn't help you?"

Color poured into her face and her eyes would not quite meet his. "I—no

—that is, I couldn't get in touch with them. Cablegrams are expensive, and I didn't have any money."

"Then, of course, they — your relatives. I mean—will not be meeting the boat when it docks."

"I—no—I will go to them—" Her voice died away beneath the look in his eyes.

"Then we will send a radiogram from the ship, telling them that you are on board so they can begin untangling the several miles of red tape that will have to be unwound before you land," said Kim. He took a pencil and an old envelope out of his pocket. "What is the name? And the address?"

"I— don't know. It's a little town in New England. My mother was born there—"

"Look," said Kim, "if you have some crazy idea that you can get into the United States simply by tucking yourself away in my quarters, you are sadly mistaken. Have you any idea just what is going to happen when your presence on board this ship is discovered?"

"You—you mean they will send me back?" the girl whispered, as though the prospect was too terrifying to bear contemplation. The tone shook him badly, for all that he tried to deny it.

"They'll do nothing else but," he told her vigorously. "There's an awful lot of red tape to be unwound, and, sister, it's got to be unwound—it can't be cut! Did you, by any chance, know that before you can land in the United States you've got to have a certificate of responsibility signed by some established citizen, swearing that you will never become a public charge? You've got to have $300 in cash and proof that there are no police charges against you in your own country—that you've never been arrested—" He stopped, startled by her reaction to that.

He had not thought it possible for her to grow more pallid. But at his last words it had accomplished that seemingly impossible thing. She moistened her lips before she could whisper. "I must have all that before I can enter your country? But it is my country, too. My mother was born in New England. There had been four generations of her family there before her."

"But your father was not an American citizen?"

"No—he was an Austrian," she answered faintly. "He was a violinist. He and my mother met when he played a concert at the school where she was a teacher. Her family was not pleased that she married a man who was not an American—and so they went abroad and lived."

Kim asked unexpectedly, "Why did you look so frightened when I said you had to prove there were no police charges against you? Surely a kid like you can't have done anything very desperate."

She drew a long breath. Then she met his eyes straightly and said, "There is a man—back there. In my own small town. I hate him. I am afraid of him. But he is rich and important—and he is a Nazi. Before the Nazis took my country, he wanted to marry me. My father took it as an insult. There was unpleasantness. And when this man came into power as the head of our village, I knew I could not escape him except by leaving the country. He could say—I know that he would say—I was a shameless person, that there were police charges against me, if that would mean having me sent back—"

She hid her face with her shaking hands. For the moment Kim forgot the annoyance he had felt at finding himself saddled with this rash little stowaway.

He put her into a chair and said gently, "Here—how long has it been since you have eaten?"

"I don't remember," she confessed.

Kim rang for a steward and waited for him outside the door. When the steward came, Kim gave him an order. Though the man looked a little puzzled, he said nothing but hurried away, pocketing Kim's tip as he went.

Kim went back into the room and stood looking down at the girl, frowning, his hands sunk deeply into his pockets. The girl looked up at him fearfully, her eyes travelling from the top of his good looking brown head to the tips of his burnished brown boots. His autumnal-brown tweeds were well cut, obviously expensive. In short, one knew at a glance, the girl told herself, that here was one of those so very rich and so very mad Americans of whom one heard so much in Europe.

There was a sound at the door and Kim turned, thinking it was the steward. Instead, it was two of his cabin mates; a short, stocky young man and a tall, thin older one. They stopped dead still at the sight of the girl.

The young man gave vent to a slight whistle and said, "Sorry, old man—we should have knocked."

Kim said sharply, "This girl is a stowaway! I found her in the shower when I came in just now."

"A stowaway?" said the older man sharply. "Then she must be reported and turned over to Captain Marsh at once."

"Look here, Blake"—Kim addressed the older man—"you're in the consular service, I think you said?"

"I am," answered Blake. "That's why I say the presence of this girl aboard must be reported immediately."

"And then what happens?" demanded Kim.

"She will be held in custody and turned over to the customs authorities at the first port of call, to be placed aboard the next ship returning to the port from which she boarded the ship—and there returned to the country where she belongs," explained Blake.

CHAPTER II

THERE was a knock at the door. Kim opened it, took the tray from the steward, kicked the door shut and put the tray of food down before the girl. She looked at it with wide, sick eyes—and then fell upon it like a starving animal. The men, in sheer pity, turned away from her.

"Look here, Blake," said Kim earnestly, "we've got to help this kid. There's a bird back there in the little village she came from—one of the petty Nazi overlords—well, he's made it tough for her. He'll make it a lot tougher if she is sent back and put in his power. And after all, she is an American—"

"It can't be done, Forsythe," Blake said quickly. "I know how you feel. I used to feel that way, too, but I found out that I either had to become hardboiled, or throw up my hands and quit."

"But if I paid her passage—"

"She would still be technically a stowaway—and she would not be allowed to land anywhere in America but at Ellis island," Blake pointed out. "She would be held there until the next boat returning to Lisbon—instead of being turned back at the first port in the Azores, as she will be now."

"But if I were to sign a certificate making myself financially responsible for her, so that there would be no danger of her becoming a public charge," pleaded Kim, "and if I gave her $300 landing money—just until she finds her mother's people and they can take over?"

"But if you've never seen the girl before—I mean, why should you go to all that bother for a stranger, when there are thousands like her?"

"I don't know. Somehow, I just can't bear the thought of handing her over to that brute of a Nazi—" began Kim, and flushed beneath the cynical look in Blake's eyes.

"My dear fellow," said Blake, "has it ever occurred to you that that's very likely a yarn she cooked up for arousing your protective instinct? It might easily be, you know."

Kim looked at the girl. She had finished the hot soup and three slices of bread. She was drinking the glass of milk with a look that made Kim think of a half starved kitten. Once more his heart was stirred with pity. No, it hadn't been a yarn cooked up to arouse his sympathy. She wasn't capable of cooking up a yarn. He'd stake his life on the fact that this girl was on the level.

He looked back and met Blake's cynical eyes and stiffened a little.

"No, it's not just a yarn," he said grimly. "That kid's on the level. She's too—well, she's too young and innocent and inexperienced to be anything else. And somehow, by hook or crook, I'm going to get her into the States!"

Blake looked at the girl and his eyes softened a little. She was so young, so utterly appealing.

"I'll do what I can to help, of course, Forsythe," he said unexpectedly.

The short, stocky young man said in a tone of surprise, "My good gosh—you are human, Blake! I'd never have suspected it."

"There are a number of things you'd never suspect, Todd," said Blake. And then to Kim, "First thing for you to do is go to Capt. Marsh and pay her fare. Don't for a moment suggest that she is a stowaway. Say that she came aboard with some friends to see you off and inadvertently got caught—fell asleep, I suppose would be the best way to put it. He probably won't believe you, but he's a decent guy and after all, he'll have several days to check on the story, before we reach port. And after that, we'll get down to brass tacks."

Kim clapped Blake on the shoulder, "Thanks, old man. I'll be right back."

The girl started to her feet uncertainly, frightened, as Kim said, "I have to go out for a bit—but these fellows will look after you. This is Mr. Blake, and this is Mr. Todd—and, come to think of it, none of us have an idea of your name."

"It's Sylvie. Sylvie Landau. You'll be back?"

"In a jiffy," promised Kim, and went out.

KIM had anticipated a bit of trouble with the captain. It developed, however, that Captain Marsh had retired but the purser was still in his little cell of an office, and to him, as nonchalantly as he could, Kim told a gay story of a girl who had come aboard with a group of his friends. He explained that she had fallen asleep and been carried away when the ship sailed. The purser finally agreed to accept the passage money, to find a nook somewhere into which to tuck the girl, and that was that. Kim, drawing a free breath, went back to the small stateroom where the girl and the two men waited.

The look of relief that leaped into her eyes as he came into the room touched Kim deeply.

Blake said, when Kim had related his talk with the purser, "You know you're only part way out of the woods, don't you, Forsythe?"

"Certainly I know that," Kim answered. "But for the immediate present, the important thing is that she is no longer a stowaway. A cot is being set up for her in the salon, and a stewardess will be here in a few minutes to put her to bed and see that she gets some rest. A little rest won't hurt her, obviously."

Blake nodded and turned away.

There was a knock at the door and a stewardess stood there, saying, "I was to look after the young lady, sir. I've set up a cot for her in the salon. There's not an inch of room anywhere else, and 20 of the ladies are already sleeping there."

Kim drew the stewardess aside, pressed a sizeable bill into her hand, and said, "See that she is made as comfortable as possible, won't you? And do you suppose it would be possible to find her something to wear? The poor kid had no intention of sailing, when she came aboard—"

The stewardess met his eyes straightly and then looked at the small, golden-haired figure that drooped with weariness.

"I understand, sir—I'll see what I can do."

"All right, kitten," Kim told Sylvie, helping her to her feet. "You run along with the stewardess now and get some shut-eye,"

"I'll see you in the morning?" she pleaded.

"I'll say you will—and every morning from now until we reach the States—maybe afterwards," Kim promised rashly, and was startled at the wave of color that flooded her face.

For the next day or two, everything went smoothly enough. The stewardess had managed to assemble a few garments for the girl; none of them fitted, but Sylvie proved to be adept with her needle and she sat with her head bent absorbedly above the task of altering the garments until they were passable. She looked, Kim thought, more than ever like a small, half starved kitten that has, in its last extremity, found succor. The rough, often unappetizing fare that was the best the overcrowded freighter could offer, seemed to her delectable, and she ate as though she had been far too long a stranger to any kind of food.

And then on the third day a blow fell. The blow that Blake had tried to assure Kim was inevitable but which Kim had tried to deny. He and Sylvie were in a sheltered corner of the deck, occupying two battered steamer chairs, when a sailor approached, saluted, looked hard at the girl and spoke to Kim.

"The captain's compliments, sir, and he would like to see you in his quarters—immediately," said the sailor.

Kim tried not to look startled and said reassuringly to Sylvie, "I'll be right back."

The sailor said, his tone very impersonal, "Sorry, sir, but the captain said the young lady was to come, too."

Kim barely suppressed a whistle. He made himself grin at Sylvie, drawing her hand through his arm as he led her down the deck, behind the sailor who was leading the way.

"Will they—will send send me back?" she whispered.

"Of course not," said Kim, with an assurance he was far from feeling. "We won't let them."

CHAPTER III

HER small, cold hand on his arm contracted a little and shook. He closed his free hand over it. Then they were stepping into the captain's quarters and the door was closing behind them, and Captain Marsh, a big, ruddy-faced, white-haired man whose uniform was rumpled as though he might have slept in it, was looking at them hard across his desk, indicating chairs.

When they were seated, the captain lifted a cablegram from his desk and said, "Mr. Forsythe, I understand you sent a cablegram day before yesterday to a little town in New England asking about a family named Easley?"

"Yes," Kim said promptly. "I hope there was no objection?"

The captain's jaw hardened a little and he went on, ignoring the edge in Kim's voice, "There is an answer to your cablegram. The elder Easleys have died. The other members of the family have scattered and, so far as the little town knows there is no trace of them."

Sylvie caught her breath and went rigid, her eyes turning from the captain's ruddy, set face to Kim's.

Kim could not deny that this was a blow. He did not realize until this moment that he had counted so confidently on turning Sylvie over to her own family. But now, if it was going to take time to locate that family—and there was no time!

"I take it for granted, Mr. Forsythe," Captain Marsh said quietly, "that the cablegram concerned relatives of the young lady here, for whom you paid passage money."

"That's right, Captain. She was inadvertently carried away when the ship sailed—"

"You're quite sure she didn't stow away—on purpose?"

Kim tried to laugh airily and knew it wasn't very successful. "That's ridiculous," he protested.

"I hope so, of course," said the captain. "Because, as you probably know, if she is a stowaway, she will have to be returned, no matter who pays her passage."

He turned to Sylvie and demanded, "Your papers, young lady — passport, visa, landing certificate—"

"She hasn't any," said Kim.

The captain turned to him sharply, not in surprise but as though a suspicion of his own had been fulfilled.

"Yet she isn't a stowaway!" he said.

"If she had been a stowaway, wouldn't she have provided herself with papers?" protested Kim. "The very fact that she has no papers with her should be ample proof that she was carried away by mistake."

Captain Marsh drew a pad of paper toward him and picked up a pencil, addressing Sylvie curtly. "Your name?"

"Sylvie Landau."

"Home? Name of the town or village from which you came?"

She gave it, and the captain wrote briskly.

He rose then, to indicate that the interview was at an end, and said, "I'll get in touch with you later, Mr. Forsythe."

Outside in the falling dusk, Sylvie stood against the rail, her hands clenched until the very wrists were taut with the strain, her face lifted, her eyes closed, her mouth set so that her profile against the dusky sky was sharp and clear-cut as a cameo.

"I won't go back," she whispered desolately, so that Kim caught the words faintly. "I won't go back—I won't! I'd rather be dead."

Kim put an arm about her and said rashly, without time for thought, "You shan't go back, Sylvie. I won't let them send you back."

She turned then and went limp in his arms, her face hidden against his shoulder, shaken by such a storm of weeping that he was almost frightened for her.

IT was an hour after breakfast the following morning before the summons they had dreaded, yet knew must come, finally reached them. They were summoned once more to the captain's quarters. This time they found him a little more stern, a little more angry.

"I'm afraid I have some unpleasant news for you, Mr. Forsythe," he said, holding out a cablegram.

Kim took it and read:

"Person mentioned has prison record. Cannot be admitted to States. Her return ordered by mayor her city."

It was signed by the American consulate in the large city in whose district lay the small village that had been Sylvie's home. Kim held the cablegram out to the captain but Sylvie caught it from him and held it in shaking hands, focusing her wide, stricken eyes upon it. Then she dropped the paper and put both hands over her face.

I told you," she whispered to Kim, "I told you he wouldn't let me get away."

Kim turned sharply to the captain.

"This is all a frame-up," he protested. "There's some devil's work in it—a prison record? This girl? Take a look at her, captain."

The captain's ruddy face was touched with the ghost of a smile as he said politely, "You have known the young lady a long time, Mr. Forsythe?"

Kim flushed. "Well, no—but I'm a good judge of human nature," he protested, and felt like a foot beneath the look in the captain's eyes. "She told me at the very firs about this man—that he would try to force her return by some such lie—"

"Oh," said the captain, glancing at Sylvie with an odd expression. "So she told you that, did she?"

"Yes," snapped Kim. "She told me—which should certainly prove her innocence."

"Or her cleverness," said Captain Marsh. "I'm sorry, Mr. Forsythe, but I have no recourse but to obey the law in this matter. The girl will have to go back."

"But—couldn't you place her in my care?" asked Kim recklessly. "I'll be responsible for her—"

The captain smiled. "I'm afraid that's quite out of the question, Mr. Forsythe—unless she were your wife."

Kim looked startled.

"If she were married to an American citizen, that would give her a special visa," the captain explained. "Permission, that is, to enter the country for 90 days. That would give you time, possibly, to clear things up."

Kim looked down at Sylvie, a small, huddled heap of despair. And from a distance, quite sure that it was not his own voice, he heard someone saying, "Then I guess that's our only out, Sylvie. You'll have to marry me."

Sylvie caught her breath and stared at him.

"Oh, come now, Mr. Forsythe," exclaimed Captain Marsh, "you mustn't take a step like this without thinking things over."

"I've done very little but think for the last 24 hours," said Kim. "I can't desert her now and see her bundled off to that town back there—not after some of the things I saw and experienced while I was high-tailing it out of Europe. No, we are considerably more than 12 miles out, Captain—so if you don't mind, I'd appreciate it enormously if you'd do the little job for us."

CHAPTER IV

SYLVIE said huskily, reluctantly pleading against what was like the very promise of Paradise itself, "Oh, Kim, you mustn't do this! It's wonderful of you, and I am grateful, but you mustn't. A girl you don't even know—there must be other girls in your home, girls you know—and love, at least a little—"

But Kim wasn't even listening. He was saying to the captain, "We'll need a couple of witnesses, won't we? I have a couple in mind I think can be trusted to keep this under their hats. I'll get them."

He was gone before Captain Marsh could stop him. And while he was gone, Sylvie huddled in her chair, dazed and incredulous before this magical thing that was about to happen.

She worshipped Kim quite simply. It was inevitable that she should. He was tall and handsome; but if he had been short and stout and ugly, she would have worshipped him just as much. Because he had been kind and generous; because he had been her friend. She had been a little shy of him. She knew that he was rich, that he was probably somebody important back home. She had not expected, if the blessed miracle of her landing in the States could be accomplished, she would ever see him again. But now—she was going to be his wife! He was going to marry her! Our of pity, of course, because he couldn't possibly love her; out of hi great heart, out of his kindness and generosity, he was going to marry her. And he did not even know that she adored him.

He mustn't know that, she promised herself; she mustn't let him guess. Because he didn't love her and if he knew she loved him it might make him uncomfortable.

She was startled when the door opened and Kim came in, followed by Blake and Todd.

Kim said a trifle grimly, "Okay, Captain Marsh—do your duty."

"If I did," growled the captain, "I'd chase you all out of here and refuse to have any part of this crazy business."

"I'm afraid you're wasting your breath, captain," Blake said. "I've talked myself blue in the face. Even the statement that, if he marries the girl, he can't divorce her for at least a year without having her shuttled back home, doesn't stop him."

Sylvie lifted a white face to Kim and stammered, "Is that true? You will have to stay married to me, even if you do not like me, to keep me from being sent back?"

Kim shrugged. "If you could see my grandmother's face at the bare thought of a divorce in the family, my treasure, you wouldn't give divorce a second thought. This is for keeps—at least, for the length of my grandmother's life, which I hope may be a great many years."

He turned to the captain. "I do not want my grandmother to know of this until I can tell her myself," he explained. "That is why I ask that the whole thing be kept a secret so that it will not get into the newspapers until I get home. Gran's health is good but it will not stand a lot of unnecessary shocks."

The captain, fumbling for his place in his prayer book, nodded and cleared his throat. Then he began to read the service.

It was over so soon that Sylvie blinked a little and Todd kissed her cheek before she realized that she was married. On her hand there was a large seal ring. Very old, very dim, as though many generations had worn it and not been too careful of it.

"As soon as we get to New York I'll replace it," said Kim when they were out on deck again, "with something a little more appropriate for a bride."

"I think this is beautiful," said Sylvie, looking with incredulous eyes at the ring, so large on her small finger that she had to close her hand to keep it from sliding off.

"You said your grandmother would not like a divorce," she reminded him a little later. "Tell me about your grandmother, Kim, please?"

"Well, she's a pretty grand old lady," said Kim. There was a thread of affection in his voice that said he was very fond of the old lady. "She's almost 80 and yet she is hale and hearty—only we try to see to it that she does not have shocks or too much excitement. My family owns an island off the Georgia coast. That is in the south—the southern part of the States, I mean—not South America. And my grandmother runs the island and the family, and keeps a pretty tight rein on just about everything."

"WILL she like me, do you think?"

Kim hesitated and then he said awkwardly, "Look here, Sylvie, I think you and I should have a showdown, a good sound understanding."

"Yes, of course."

"It's just that—well, you see, Sylvie, this—this marriage was sort of thrust upon us. I mean that in the ordinary course of events, you'd probably never have given me a second glance." Before she could protest, he added. "And while you're a sweet and lovely girl and I like you a lot, you're — well, you're not exactly the type of girl I go for—"

Sylvie drew a hard breath and Kim, annoyed, said swiftly, "I'm sorry Sylvie, but, after all, we must face facts. This situation we've got ourselves into is pretty ridiculous. The only way out is to be mercilessly frank. You do see that, don't you?"

"Yes, of course," said Sylvie, turning her face away so that he could not see her eyes.

"Well, all I'm trying to say is that once we are in New York, I'll get you a place to live and put some money in the bank for you, and see that you get a monthly cheque, while you study something that will make you happy and give you a chance at a career or whatever you want," said Kim, floundering a little but going doggedly on, because these things had to be said. "You will be busy as a bird-dog during the next 90 days, learning to do all the things you'll have to learn in order to make your visa permanent. I'll see that you have teachers and all that. After all, as I see it, there is really no reason why you should have to meet my grandmother—she can be a pretty terrible old lady when she wants to be—or have her know of our marriage at all. And then at the end of a year when you get your first citizenship papers, we can have the marriage quietly annulled and nobody will know the difference. You do see that's wise, don't you, Sylvie?"

Kim looked down at her, troubled and uncomfortable, and beginning to feel more than a little annoyed now that the reaction from that reckless, impulsive moment when he had decided to marry her was beginning to wear off.

"Look here, Sylvie—" he began, but Sylvie had found a measure of composure and she was standing straight and slim before him, for all her daintiness managing to look almost regal.

"Please don't say any more," she cried. "I am so terribly ashamed that I let you do this thing. Oh, it was kind of you and generous and—and chivalrous. But I had no right to let you do it."

"Oh don't be a little goop, Sylvie," protested Kim, his hands on her shoulders, giving her a gentle shake. "We are all past that. There's no thought of your going back—ever. I'll fix everything up for you before I leave New York so that you can comply with all the regulations by which you can become a citizen. And you can also be studying something that will give you a chance at a career—a life of your own—"

"So that some day I can pay you back—a little—for all that you are doing for me," Sylvie finished for him breathlessly. "It is the only way I will have it—I shall owe you so much. If I can repay you a very little—"

"You can repay me by being a good girl, a good citizen and, above everything else, by being happy," said Kim.

She lifted wide gray eyes, shimmering a little behind the film of her tears, and said huskily, "I will do that. I promise. I will be happy—and I will be good."

Kim, trying to ease the painful tension of the moment, grinned at her and put a brotherly arm about her shoulders and gave her a little hug. "Sure you will—happy and good. You couldn't be anything else."

Those who had witnessed the marriage—Captain Marsh, Blake, Todd—were sworn to secrecy. The captain and Blake, sternly disapproving, had no wish to prattle of what had happened. But Todd was an unknown quantity. A man whom Kim had met only when he learned they were to share a stateroom; short, stocky, cheerful, good-natured, he seemed amusing enough. Though Kim could not imagine ever being on very friendly terms with him. But Kim had no reason to believe that Todd, having given his word, would break it.

CHAPTER V

NEITHER Kim nor Sylvie ever forgot that misty, cold morning when the old freighter plowed up the river past the statue of Liberty.

Kim, standing beside her, was so absorbed in the thrill of being home again that he was scarcely aware of the picture Sylvia made.

But as they reached the foot of the gangplank half a dozen eager-eyed young men lunged forward; there was the click of cameras; a flashlight exploded; someone said, "Is this the refugee bride, Mr. Forsythe?" And somebody else asked that inevitable question, to one just off a ship, "What do you think of America, Mrs. Forsythe?"

Kim stood still for a moment, stunned by the unexpectedness of all this. At the far edge of the crowd, Kim saw Todd grinning at him, and holding up his hand in a little satirical salute as he vanished into the crowd.

When Kim had finally managed to fight his way to a taxi, thrust Sylvie into it and follow her, his face was dark with fury.

He said nothing, thinking hard and fast as the taxi sped uptown. At the hotel, he got out, turned to Sylvie. As she would have got out, still clutching the small miserable bundle, he said something under his breath, snatched the bundle from her, flung it into the street and all but jerked her out of the taxi.

The doorman touched his hat to Kim and said, "Good-morning, Mr. Forsythe. It's good to see you again."

Kim said, "Thanks," and stalked into the hotel, Sylvie trotting beside him. She was appalled by the noise, the confusion, and by what had happened at the dock.

The clerk behind the desk in the hotel greeted Kim by name, mourned the fact that it had been a long time since he had honored the hotel with his patronage. He politely pretended not to see Sylvie at all.

"And may I offer my congratulations, Mr. Forsythe?" the clerk finished suavely.

Kim looked up sharply. "Congratulations? For what?" he snapped.

"On your marriage, Mr. Forsythe. It's been quite a story in the papers—the news was radioed from your ship—"

"Oh," said Kim grimly, and added, "thanks—very decent of you. I'd like a long distance telephone connection, please—to Halcyon Island. Put the call through to my quarters."

"Of course, Mr. Forsythe," said the clerk, and watched Sylvie and Kim follow a bellboy to the elevators.

In the suite to which they had been shown Kim looking swiftly about the sitting room, crossed to a door at the left, opened it and turned to Sylvie. "Here, this is your room, I suppose. I'm right across there."

The telephone rang and he picked it up.

"Ready on your call to Halcyon Island, Mr. Forsythe," said the operator.

"Thanks—let's go," said Kim. And then, "Hello—that you, Pete? Hello—how's the boy?" he added swiftly in a note of eager welcome.

He listened and Sylvie, watching, saw his face change swiftly. Saw him look startled and angry and then uneasy.

"Okay, Pete—I'll take the first plane," he said shortly. "I should be there some time in the morning."

He put down the telephone, waited a moment, then lifted the receiver again and said crisply, "Find out how soon I can get a plane south — to Savannah. Reserve a seat for me and call me back. And make it snappy will you?"

He put down the telephone again and turned to discover Sylvie at the door, waiting, shrinking a little from the look in his eyes.

"My grandmother is very ill," he said. "She doesn't know about all this—this hanky-panky. Thank heaven for that. I'll have to get there as soon as I can."

"Yes, of course," said Sylvie faintly.

"I can't take you with me," Kim said awkwardly. "I'll have to send for you later. There is no time to make plans—to think of what we must do."

The telephone rang, and he caught it up and listened. "In an hour?" he repeated. "Yes, thanks, I can make it. I've got to make it."

He turned back to Sylvie and drew some money out of his billfold, laying it on the table. "That will keep you going for a few days," he told her. "I'll arrange with the clerk downstairs so that you can have more as you need it. And as soon as I get home, I'll write you—I don't know what I'm doing or saying—"

"You do not have to worry about me," Sylvie assured him swiftly. "I know that you are worried about your grandmother. She is ill and needs you. You must go at once. I will be all right—truly, I will."

Kim's face lightened a little with relief, and he said quickly, "Thanks—that's good of you. I'll call you as soon as I see how things are down home, and we can make some plans. Perhaps I can fly back for a day or two and get you all settled. Meanwhile you'll want to do some shopping. Buy whatever you need and have it charged to the hotel account. I'll arrange about that. And I'll arrange for you to draw money as you need it, until I can get a bank account started."

"You must go now," said Sylvie. "There is so little time—"

"Yes, I guess I'd better." Kim caught up the bag that the bellboy had just placed in his room. "I'll phone you—or write."

The door closed behind him and he was gone.

Sylvie waited a long moment as though she had some crazy idea that he would come back. But of course he didn't. And now that it was no longer important for her to maintain her composure, she stumbled into a chair and put her shaking hands over her face.

When she had cried out a little of the heartache and loneliness that shook her so badly, she sat up and looked about her at the luxuriously furnished suite; the great windows that opened on a terrace high above what she was to know was Park Ave., but which to her now was merely a wide, imposing street with a parkway down the centre. It was mid-winter and there were patches of snow along the parkway.

She looked about her at the room with its beautiful furnishings; the deep-piled rug into which her feet in their clumsy, broken shoes sank deeply. She sat up at last and looked at herself in the mirror, and recoiled a little at what she saw. A girl in a sleazy woollen dress, her only wrap a shawl, folded closely about her shivering shoulders. No hat, her hands bare and reddened with the cold, for she had not yet grown warm, despite the almost oppressive heat in the room.

She went back to the table and looked at the little sheaf of bills. Her mother had taught her to understand American money; on the ship she had seen a few bills. But this—crisp green and white bills, each of them marked in the upper corners with thick white figures reading "100." There were five of them—and she knew that this was $500! And that, in the little Austrian village, was dizzying wealth! Once, when she had been just a little girl, a friend of her father had come back from America and had brought $300 in American money. He had been looked upon as rich, and had bought a tiny farm—yet she, a homeless, friendless refugee, had $500 that was all her own!

She was almost afraid to touch it. She was startled when there came a knock at the door and she whirled about to face it, calling fearfully, "Come in."

The door opened and a girl who seemed to Sylvie the most beautiful creature she had ever seen—slim and tall and tailored in a black frock, her hatless dark head smooth and shining—came in.

"Hello," said the girl cheerfully. "Don't look so alarmed. I'm only one of the hotel hostesses. Mr. Forsythe left word at the desk that you were here and alone, and asked that we see you were looked after. So I've come along to see if there is anything I can do for you."

Sylvie said shakily, "You are very kind."

CHAPTER VI

THE girl's eyes sharpened a little and she said gently, "You've been crying. Don't you know you mustn't do that? You're a refugee, aren't you? And I suppose things were pretty terrible over there. But you're here now and you're safe. You mustn't even remember the terrible things you've gone through. Have you relatives back there?"

Sylvie shook her head. "No—no one."

"Then you don't have to be worried about what might be happening to them," said the girl. "I'd say about the first thing you'd want would be some clothes, don't you think? And maybe a toothbrush and a nightie or two!"

"It is cold out—and I have nothing but this to wear—"

The girl laughed and picked up the telephone, saying, "That's why stores have personal shopping services, child."

Sylvie listened, bewildered, as the girl gave brisk orders for an entire outfit, including underwear and shoes. She paused now and then to ask Sylvie about sizes, or to eye her speculatively. When she had finished and put down the receiver, she turned and said, "Now, what about some food? And maybe a nap while we wait for the shop to deliver that order?"

In the next few days Sylvie and Isabel became firm friends. Sylvie hung on Isabel's pronouncements as though they were the law of the Medes and Persians. Isabel was touched and a little amused at the abject slavishness with which Sylvie obeyed her. And, too, Isabel had been touched by the romance in the story of this small refugee girl and the socially important and wealthy Kim Forsythe.

As Sylvie relaxed in the warm friendliness of this new atmosphere, as she ate the nourishing food that Isabel ordered for her, her color came back and her eyes were bright and eager. She developed into something very pretty and very sweet; not a great beauty, for she was too small and too exquisitely formed for that; but into a loveliness that was real and appealing.

The first few days flew by. Sylvie did not expect to hear from Kim right away. Humbly she told herself that when he had nothing more important to do, he would call her; perhaps write to her. She had no right to expect more from him.

She was attending daily classes in citizenship, as arranged by Isabel; and Isabel was seeing to it that she did not spend too many evenings alone, though she had so many bewildering books to study that she was seldom lonely. Isabel took her on shopping forays, too, helping her to select becoming, tasteful clothes and refusing to allow her to pay for them, insisting that Kim would be annoyed, since he had made arrangements for the hotel to look after her expenses and to render him a statement.

One evening Isabel insisted on dragging her away from her books and to a party. Sylvie enjoyed every minute of it. There was a very gay and amusing young man who took a fancy to her and who spent almost the entire evening dancing with her, or sitting with her on a divan in a corner, listening to her tell him about the little village where she had lived; about her mother and her father; about the flight she had made from the horror when Hitler had marched in. Adroitly he led her on to tell him about Kim and her marriage. After all, there was really no further need for secrecy, since the newspapers had already told the story. And he was such a pleasant young man, and so interested.

But when Isabel left her at the door of her suite that night, Sylvie was puzzled by what Isabel said: "Sorry, baby—it was a mean trick. Still, if you're ever in love you'll probably be willing to do a dirty trick to another girl—if it helps the guy you love."

Sylvie said, bewildered, "But I do not understand—"

Isabel wasn't listening. She had already turned away and was walking toward the elevator. Puzzled, Sylvie watched until the elevator door closed behind Isabel. Then she turned and went on into her own room; but she carried with her the puzzle of Isabel's strange behavior.

SYLVIE was as faithful as a good child to her hours of lessons on citizenship. Painfully, almost frantically eager to comply with every regulation that would help her to become an American citizen, as her mother had been born. She thought often of her mother as she studied and worked over the rules and regulations and laws that were carefully and painstakingly explained to her, one of a group of anxious, hopeful would-be citizens, by the teachers.

She came back to the hotel late on the second day after the party. As the clerk handed her her key, and her heart did its usual little nose-dive at the discovery that there was still no letter from Kim, the clerk said, "There's a gentleman waiting for you in your suite, Mrs. Forsythe. He's been there more than an hour."

She all but burst open the door—and then she stood against it and looked, startled, at the strange man who stood waiting for her. He was not as tall as Kim; he was slight; his hair was almost as fair as her own; his eyes were blue. He studied her curiously, and then he said, "Why, you're only a baby!"

"I'm 19," said Sylvie promptly. "I'm afraid I don't know you. Are you from the immigration department?"

The man gave a friendly laugh and said, "Gosh no! Are they making things tough for you? Kim should be kicked for rushing off and leaving you—" Then he caught himself up, as though he must not risk impulsive speech, and went on more formally, "I'm sorry—I'm stupid not to introduce myself. I'm Peter Marvin, Kim's cousin. He has sent me to bring you home."

Sylvie caught her breath and for a moment the floor seemed to jerk beneath her feet. Her eyes widened and her face, that had been pallid with uneasiness bordering on fear, colored as she cried, "Kim sent you?"

Peter looked uncomfortable and did not quite meet her eyes. "I know you are disappointed that he did not come himself. But his grandmother is still pretty sick and she's—well, she can be a pretty dictatorial old lady. She decided that it's high time Kim took over his share of running the place, and—well, between them, they decided that I should see to bringing you home."

Sylvie was still for a moment and then she said awkwardly, scarlet now with confusion and embarrassment, "I'm afraid you misunderstood Kim. You see, he made it very plain before he left that I was to stay here. He—he didn't want me at his home. You see ours is just a make-believe marriage. As soon as I have my first citizenship papers, the marriage is to be annulled—"

Peter said, "But all this stuff in the papers has changed that. I'm afraid he's a bit cross about this interview you've given out. It doesn't put him in a very favorable light, and you're likely to discover, before you've been married to Kim very long, that he very much dislikes being put in an unfavorable light."

"But I haven't given any interview. I haven't talked to any newspaper people. The office downstairs won't let any of them up—"

REFUGEE BRIDE TELLS ALL

With unbelieving eyes Sylvie turned to the page mentioned and read the story. And knew that the pleasant, amusing young man who had been so interested in her, at the party to which Isabel had taken her, had been a reporter! She could understand now what Isabel had meant when she said, "It was a mean trick, baby—"

CHAPTER VII

SYLVIE flung the paper from her and covered her face with her hands. Midway between tears and a cold and furious anger at the betrayal of Isabel, she told Peter how the story had been tricked out of her. And Peter, listening, swore under his breath. But when she had finished he said, "I can understand exactly how it happened, Sylvie. It's not your fault at all. If anybody is to blame, it's Kim—"

"Oh, but you mustn't say that! He's been so wonderful to me! If he hadn't married me, they would have sent me back—" She shivered and could not go on.

"I know. But having married you and deposited you here in a strange city, among strangers—well, after all, I think one action sort of blocks out the other. Either he shouldn't have married you at all; or, having married you, he should certainly have taken better care of you," said Peter.

"You don't like Kim, do you?" Sylvie said curiously.

"Frankly," said Peter, "I dislike him as much as any man I've ever known! It's no secret. Kim knows how I feel toward him. He feels the same way toward me. We maintain an armed truce."

"You live close together?"

"Too close in the same house," answered Peter. "Aunt Chloe—Kim's grandmother—insists on all the clan living beneath the same roof. Why we haven't cut each other's throats long ago I'll never know. Sheer accident, I suppose. Anyway—you might as well get used to the idea that Halcyon Island is like no other place in the world, and the people who live there are—well, at least a trifle unique. You'll find that out for yourself before you've been there 24 hours."

"But I am not to go there. Kim made that plain—"

"That was before all this—er—publicity broke in the newspapers," Peter pointed out. "Now that Aunt Chloe knows all about the marriage, she is scandalized that Kim did not bring you home with him. I've been sent to bring you."

"But would it not be more simple, since we are to be divorced—"

"Look, infant," said Peter, suddenly grave and gentle, "let me give you a bit of advice. Never mention the word divorce in Aunt Chloe's presence. It is a word she abominates. The very sound of it makes her wild. There has never been a divorce in the family as far back as the records go—and that's several hundred years. She told Kim, when this story leaked out, that she would never permit him to—'sully the family honor,' was the way she put it."

"But she can't force Kim to live with me. He—he doesn't love me."

"Maybe not. But she can keep him from divorcing you—you can take my word for that!" said Peter firmly. Then he grinned at her and added more cheerfully, "We are to take the plane south in the morning. Meanwhile, we have the evening to kill. What would you like to do? I seldom get in to New York. We can have fun!"

And they did. The sort of fun two young people forgetting serious problems may have in New York. Since Sylvie knew very little about the city itself, Peter set the pace. Dinner at the Automat, since Sylvie vetoed the idea of getting dressed up and taking in the smart clubs, a prospect which Peter admitted, when urged, depressed him unutterably. They rode on the subway, far uptown to where the Fifth Avenue buses congregate while their operators find time for a cup of coffee and a cigarette. They rode downtown on the upper deck of a bus, all the way to Washington Square. Peter told her fascinating stories of the days when New York was young and the Bowery was "way uptown" and life was comparatively simple.

It was dusk when the plane descended and Peter helped her out of it. A car was waiting at the edge of the runway. She and Peter got into it, their baggage stowed about them. They drove for perhaps 20 minutes through a world that was bewilderingly green and lovely in the dusk.

The car stopped beside a small dock. At the end, a speedboat waited. A sailor emerged to take their luggage from the taxi driver. An officer, immaculate in white ducks, helped Sylvie aboard, and greeted Peter with a friendly "Hiya, Mr. Pete!"

The motor roared and the small boat shot out from the dock, across the silvery gleam of the water. Sylvie was to learn that this was not the ocean, as she had first thought, but an inlet that they must cross to reach Halcyon Island.

A GLEAMING station wagon stood waiting. The chauffeur stowed the luggage in it and Peter said, frowning a little as he looked about, "Where is Mr. Kim, Charlie?"

The chauffeur said expressionlessly, his eyes discreetly lowered, "Old Miss ain't feelin' so good today—she's got him with her."

Peter nodded and Sylvie saw his jaw harden.

There were a dozen or more Negroes, men and boys, busy about the wharf. Others peered from the various boats nearby. Across the wharf and facing it, there was a row of buildings, the centre one displaying a big sign reading, "Halcyon Commissary." The other buildings were smaller and clustered about this like chickens about a mother hen.

Peter put Sylvie into the station wagon. The chauffeur slid behind the wheel, while white and black faces peered from windows, and Sylvie knew she was being inspected thoroughly by the denizens of the island.

Peter talked to her, pointing out the fish-packing plant; the great shed where Negro women cooked the shrimp. He explained that later the shrimp would be packed in glass jars, with the Halcyon Island label.

Sylvie listened politely but with only half her attention. She was seeing the loveliness of the island, now that the packing plant, the cooking shed, the commissary, the wharf and its boats had been left behind; the careful, orderly beauty of expert landscaping, vying with the wild, natural beauty that only nature herself can achieve.

The station wagon turned at last into a long drive bordered on either side by giant oleander trees, with, at their feet, the bright soft flames of azaleas stabbing the darkness.

Beyond, facing the ocean, Sylvie caught the white gleam of a house that looked, to her startled eyes, like a castle. It was so big, outlined against the dark ocean beyond; lights twinkling in all the lower windows and in most of the upper ones. In front of it there was a flight of steps leading up from an oblong swimming pool. At the left, down a flight of shallow steps, she caught a glimpse of flowers and shrubbery—a sunken garden.

CHAPTER VIII

THE car stopped in front of the house, a drive that circled past the front steps and around to the right, where a road led down to the garage and stables.

Peter got out and helped Sylvie down. A servant came out to take charge of the luggage. Peter, holding Sylvie's hand, said, smiling a little though his eyes were dark and angry, "Welcome home, Sylvie!"

And Sylvie knew that he was angry because no one else—that meant Kim, of course—had come to welcome her. She tried to thank Peter, but the words came stumblingly. Her mouth felt stiff and taut, as though the effort to keep it from trembling made it impossible for her to speak or to smile.

The door stood open and Peter drew her into the house. The reception hall was a great square room with a huge fireplace and on either side of it rose the staircase to join above it and become one. Everything was handsome, well kept, luxurious. It was quite obvious that here was plenty of money and excellent taste, and that it had all endured for a great many years.

There was a sound above the stairs and then Kim came swiftly down the stairs, saying, "Oh, so you're here—"

Then, halfway down the stairs, he stopped and stared at Sylvie as though the sight of her had laid a hand on his shoulder.

She was much prettier than when he had seen her last; the rest, the freedom from the horror with which she had lived abroad, and good, nourishing food, accounted for that. He had never before seen her properly dressed; and the suit she wore, of beige and blue plaid, a silly little blue hat with a gay yellow feather perched nonchalantly above one eye, navy blue slippers and bag completing the outfit, was smart and vastly becoming.

Kim said, startled, "Well, hello!" And came on down the stairs. Peter stood aside, looking on, a trifle sardonic.

Sylvie said, her voice shaken a little, as she put her hand in Kim's, "Hello, Kim!" And then, because she could not keep the words back, she stammered impulsively, "I've missed you!"

Kim straightened and seemed to remember that he did not like her very well. "Sorry," he said almost curtly. "I've been detained here."

A sound at the door of the drawing-room carried their eyes that way and Sylvie all but gasped. For the woman—she was in her early twenties, scarcely more than a girl—was the most stunning thing she had ever seen. The girl was almost as tall as Kim, had copper-colored hair, green eyes, and a skin as perfect as the petals of a gardenia. She was so vibrant, so alive, so glowing with perfect health and well-being that Sylvie felt as though a brisk wind blew through the room when she entered.

"Hello, Pete," the girl said in a warm, rich voice.

She looked down at Sylvie, and then, her eyes widening, she turned to Kim and said, "Why, Kim—you cradle-robber! I'm ashamed of you!"

Kim, flushed and awkward, said, "Oh, lay off, Judith. I told you how it all happened."

Peter said grimly, "Since nobody else seems interested in offering introductions, permit me, Sylvie, to present Miss Judith Evans—a distant relative, though we aren't quite sure just what the degree is."

"Hello, Sylvie," said Judith. Her hand, that was quite large but beautifully kept, swallowed Sylvie's with a grip that was almost painful. "I hope you'll be very happy here—but then I'm an optimist."

"Skip it, will you?" Peter said sharply. "The kid's scared to death already."

"What—a bride on her honeymoon frightened at her husband's family? Well, what do you expect, Petey? It's traditional—nothing else," said Judith.

She turned to Sylvie and said smoothly, "You'd like to go to your own room, of course, and rest until dinner. May I show you the way?"

"Thank you," said Sylvie a trifle stiffly. She knew that she was going to cry if she were not given a few minutes' privacy to pull herself together. "You are very kind."

Judith looked derisively at Peter and said, "Of course I am—even if I'm seldom given credit for it. Come along, Sylvie—this way."

The room to which she showed Sylvie was large and square. It was furnished with massive mahogany pieces that had been rubbed to a satiny texture that added to its beauty. The rug was a thin, all but priceless old Aubusson. The draperies were of damask in a faint, flowery pattern, above sheer glass curtains. The whole effect was rich and dignified and very handsome.

Judith's manner was friendly and cordial. The essence of hospitality. A little colored maid was unpacking Sylvie's luggage and Judith's eyes flickered a little as the girl shook out delicate lingerie and dainty frocks and placed them in drawers or on padded hangers.

"I hope you won't be too tired to dress for dinner," said Judith as she was about to leave the room. "Aunt Chloe is very strict about that. She claims we mustn't let down just because we live so far from civilization."

"I am not too tired. I will be glad to dress for dinner," said Sylvie politely, and waited for Judith to go.

Judith laughed as her eyes flickered toward the open suitcase, and she said, with just the tiniest edge to her voice, "If I had your resources, I wouldn't mind dressing for dinner either. But if you ever had to 'make-do' with the contents of certain chests in the attic—" She shrugged and turned away.

At the door she paused to say, "There are chimes—when you hear them come straight down the stairs. Someone will be watching to show you the way."

She went out and closed the door behind her.

"What dress y'all going to wear, Miz' Kim?" asked the wide-eyed maid eagerly.

"Something simple — that isn't too rumpled—"

"Like this here?" The maid held up a simple white frock that had escaped wrinkling too much.

Sylvie nodded and the girl spread the dress carefully across the bed, assembled silver-strapped sandals, cobwebby hose and lingerie. She ran a bath, sprinkled bath salts in it with a lavish hand, and stood watchfully by when Sylvie emerged from the bath, feeling refreshed in spite of her mental turmoil.

Sylvie had never had a personal maid, of course; but this one—she said her name was Hattie—was so deft, so friendly, that it seemed good to Sylvie to submit to her ministrations. And when she was dressed, Sylvie regarded the vision that looked back at her from the mirror and drew a deep breath. She was lovely. That gave her a measure of courage to go down the stairs and face Kim, and the rest of this family that Peter had hinted about.

SHE was almost ready to leave the room when there was a knock at the door and it opened to reveal a plump blonde woman whose round face was friendly. Her blue eyes were curious and her voice was warm when she said:

"My dear, I'm your sister-in-law, Laura. I'm Andy's wife. And I've come to tell you that you've one friend here—and you'll probably need plenty before you are finished."

"How do you do?" Sylvie stammered. "I'm afraid—that is—you may go, Hattie."

"Yessum," said Hattie. At the door she paused to say sternly, "Now, don't y'all skeer her to death, Miss Lolly. She's a sweet lady, and mammy said I was gonna be her maid."

"Out, you impertinent little hussy," Laura said curtly, "and stay out."

Hattie smothered a grin and went out.

"Good heavens, you're only a child!" said Laura as the door closed behind Hattie.

Sylvie set her teeth. "Perhaps I should carry a rattle and talk baby talk—everybody seems terribly concerned that I'm so young. I'm 19."

Laura nodded and sat down. "You're very pretty—but then, of course, I knew you must be or Kim would never have made such a fool of himself."

Sylvie stiffened and her eyes flashed. "I'm sorry," Laura exclaimed. "I didn't mean that the way it sounded—truly, I didn't. I talk too much, of course, and think too little—but I really am your friend, and I want you to know that. I am afraid you are going to need friends badly here."

"You are kind," said Sylvie politely.

Laura looked up at her.

"If you can just learn to take the family in your stride," Laura said earnestly, "though I realize, of course, that's asking an awful lot of a young thing like you. Still, the only one you need really be afraid of is Chloe."

"You mean the gran-mere? But she is a very old lady, and sick. Why must one be afraid of her?"

"Because," Laura said, "Kim is the apple of her eye, and she had some plans of her own about his marriage. That is not your fault, of course. If the highly colored stories we have read in the papers are to be believed in any small part, you really were in a spot when Kim came along and gave you a hand. That's Kim's dish—rescuing damsels in distress, if they are young and pretty. But—leaving someone else to clean up the resulting mess—that's also one of Kim's charming little ways. Marrying you, and then abandoning you in New York—that was pretty typical of Kim."

Sylvie head was high and her eyes were flashing.

"Kim scarcely 'abandoned' me," she said frostily. "He saw to it that I had a place to live, more money than I had ever dreamed I should have, people to look after me, work to do. What more could he have done?"

Laura stared at her, eyebrows raised a trifle as she said, "Well, for heaven's sake, child, I'm on your side. You don't have to go all high and mighty with me. Kim should have brought you home with him, of course."

"Why?" demanded Sylvie. "He was not in love with me—there was no question of love. He simply kept me from being sent back to—to things I will not even remember. Does that mean that he must be burdened with me for the rest of his life?"

Laura stood up, tall and almost regal. "I'm afraid it does, chick—since divorce is a word never mentioned within the sacred precincts of Forsythe Hall," she said coolly. As the chimes sounded below stairs she said politely, "Shall we go down?"

Across the hall the queenly Judith was emerging from her room, and there was no further chance for conversation between Laura and Sylvie, as the three of them went down the stairs together.

The main drawing-room, at the left of the reception hall, was a pleasant room. There was a great fire of logs in an enormous fireplace and standing before this were three men—Kim and Peter, both very handsome in evening attire, and an older man whom Sylvie had not seen before. There was a family resemblance between him and Kim. But he was five or six years older and a little heavier. There were even a few threads of silver in his hair, obviously premature, but giving him an added distinction.

Laura went straight to him, slid her hand through his arm and, indicating Sylvie, said cheerfully, "Andy, darling, meet the child-bride. Sylvie, as you must have guessed, this is my husband—Kim's brother, Andrew."

Andrew smiled a warm, friendly smile that went straight to Sylvie's heart. He held out his hand, saying cordially, "Hello, Sylvie—and welcome, with all my heart, to Halcyon!"

Sylvie smiled shyly. "Thank you," she said. "You are very kind."

Judith was saying something in an undertone to Kim, who laughed. As she moved away, Kim's eyes followed her with a look that startled Sylvie. Was Kim in love with Judith?

A very dignified old Negro butler in well brushed livery, followed by a neatly uniformed waitress, came in with a tray of cocktails. The maid carried canapes.

Andrew tried to draw Sylvie out, to get her to talking. Kim stood aside looking on, almost sullen, almost morose, yet watching Sylvie curiously.

The scene was, on the surface, peaceful, friendly. Peter tried to make up for Kim's silence by talking more than usual. Judith, at the farther end of the room, glanced through a magazine.

Sylvie thought it was like a stage setting. What were they waiting for? The next minute she knew, for there came a sound in the hall outside, the sound of a woman's querulous voice. Then a Negro woman in the uniform of a trained nurse wheeled a chair of the most modern streamlined make into the room, and Sylvie looked down into the face of Kim's grandmother, whom she had begun dimly to suspect of being some sort of dreadful dragon.

CHAPTER IX

"SO!" said the old lady in the wheel chair. "You are the refugee girl?"

She was very tiny and very old. Her face was the color of old ivory and there was a bit of rouge carefully applied on either cheekbone. Her hair was abundant and blue-white against the immaculate pillows behind her. Her gown was of black satin so rich and fine that it was like black water poured about her. The lace fichu that was crossed over her breast and fastened with a cameo pin was as delicate as a cobweb.

She was a story-book old lady; sweet and saintly looking—until one looked into her eyes. At the present moment they were very black and very cold and very hard.

Kim came forward almost reluctantly and said, "Chloe, this is Sylvie—my wife."

"Well, who did you expect me to think it was—Joan of Arc?" the old lady said sharply.

Andrew said gently, "Don't frighten the girl, Chloe—"

"And why should she be frightened of a worn-out old woman like me?"

Sylvie had herself well in hand by now and could speak quietly and clearly.

"I think perhaps, Mrs. Forsythe, it might be just as well if we understood each other from the very beginning," she said. Her voice was quiet, level, but it reached to the farthest corner of the room, and Judith put aside her magazine to listen. "You see Kim had no thought of burdening himself with me. He was thinking only of rescuing me from a terrible situation—"

"And you were thinking that you were penniless and without friends and that he was an enormously rich young man," Chloe cut in with deliberate insolence.

Sylvie squared her shoulders, saying: "That is not true. I knew nothing of him beyond his name. And it was understood from the first that the marriage was just a make-believe, that it was to be ended as soon as I had become a citizen. I can get my first papers, and then we can have the marriage annulled."

"There will never be a divorce in this family as long as I am alive to prevent it," Chloe said sharply.

"But that is silly," said Sylvie rashly. "You cannot expect Kim to wreck his life by being burdened with a woman he does not love."

"I expect Kim to shoulder the responsibilities and obligations that he assumes, carelessly or otherwise," Chloe announced.

"But you cannot force him to live with me. This is America! Parents do not force their children into marriages they do not want."

Chloe grinned. It wasn't a smile. It was a deliberately malicious grin, and she cried triumphantly, "No, I can't force him to live with you! But I can forbid him to divorce you. If he goes against my wishes, I shall turn him out of the house without a penny and write him out of my will!"

Kim came forward and said hurriedly, "For heaven's sake, Sylvie, don't excite her. She's been ill. We all give in to her, rather than excite her."

And to Chloe he said soothingly, "Hey, pipe down, youngster, or you'll get a spanking and be sent to bed without your supper! What's all this disgraceful talk about a divorce? Who's going to get a divorce? Certainly not Sylvie and me—why, I'm crazily in love with her, and insanely happy."

"And the world's worst liar, to boot," sniffed Chloe, but Sylvie saw that she was mollified by Kim's words. "Now, what's the matter with that butler? Isn't dinner ready yet?"

The butler and two waitresses served delicate food, cooked deliciously, to all the family save Chloe. Enthroned in her chair at the head of the table, she crumbled four graham crackers into a blue Spode bowl half-filled with creamy milk.

Judith led the conversation, gay and witty and thoroughly up-to-date on current affairs. Now and then she asked Sylvie a question, very courteous, but she scarcely waited for Sylvie's answers before going briskly on with her own subjects.

Chloe looked suddenly at Sylvie and asked, "Tell me about yourself, my dear. How did you happen to be a refugee, even though you are partly an American?"

Sylvie answered her courteously and promptly.

"My mother taught school in a small New England seminary," she answered. "My father was a concert violinist. He came to the school to give a recital and he and my mother fell in love. They eloped three days later."

"Disgraceful!" gasped Chloe.

Sylvie colored, but her tone was smooth and controlled as she said, "I don't think so. They adored each other. I never heard them speak a cross word to each other. I'm quite sure they were never sorry for their elopement—and I do not believe my mother was ever homesick for one single moment, because they loved each other so truly."

"You believe that people love each other like that nowadays?" Chloe demanded unexpectedly.

"I don't believe anything else is worthy of being called love."

Chloe nodded and looked sternly at Kim.

"I hate to say it, Kim—you good-for-nothing scamp—but I think you've brought home a winner!" she said firmly. "Good New England stock, mixed with good peasant blood. The family needed new blood, and I think you've brought it to us."

Sylvie said evenly, "I think you are forgetting, Mrs. Forsythe, that this—this marriage is merely a temporary matter."

Chloe looked straight at Sylvie and her eyes were black beads of malice and warning.

"Do you know what I'm going to do, if I hear you say one more word about divorcing my grandson—or allowing him to divorce you?" she asked silkily. There was something in her tone that, for all its gentleness, made Sylvie suddenly afraid.

"What can you do—" she began, but Chloe raised a thin hand with an almost regal gesture that demanded silence.

"I shall have you deported," she said, almost sweetly.

There was a little silence about the table and Sylvie broke it by saying sharply, "But you can't do that—"

"Can't I? My dear, it would be the easiest thing in the world. I don't think you realize that I am a very influential woman. I need only file certain charges against you in the right direction—and within 24 hours you will find yourself aboard a ship to whatever ridiculous village you came from."

Sylvie stared at her, appalled.

"I can't believe it," she said at last. "I can't believe that a woman old and—and tired with living, as you are, could be so—so horrible."

"Sylvie!" cried Kim. Peter laid a warning hand on Sylvie's arm, but she shook it free and faced the old woman with her golden head erect, her eyes blazing.

"Let her alone," said Chloe, eyeing her with warm satisfaction. "I like a good fighter—but I've no use for a fool. And a fool is what you will be, my dear, if you try to fight me."

She broke another cracker into the milk that remained in her bowl, and looked up, her black eyes travelling about the table from one startled face to another.

"It might be just as well if you all listened to me for a moment," she said in a tone so controlled that it was almost tranquil. "The Forsythes have always been a proud family. Our history goes back more than 400 years. And in all the years, we have been people of importance, of social integrity, of power and influence. Not once has an ugly scandal touched that name, and not once has there been a divorce in the family. The name means a great deal to me. I had hoped it might mean a great deal to my two grandsons, the last of the family. Upon you rests the burden of maintaining the family traditions. I love you—both of you. But I would rather see you dead than to have either of you bring a breath of scandal on our name. Or a divorce upon it."

She turned her head and looked straight at Sylvie.

"And so Kim has brought us a lot of unpleasant publicity, and you, too, have had a hand in that. But that is not a scandal," she said firmly. "Nor would having you deported be as bad as having you divorce Kim. I would a thousand times rather have you deported and be hailed as a woman who has done her duty by her country than to have you and Kim drag the Forsythe name through the divorce courts."

Sylvie started to say something, but Chloe flung up an impatient hand. "That's enough—I'm tired!" she exclaimed. "I won't discuss it any more. There's nothing to discuss. I've delivered my ultimatum—and I won't change my mind."

She turned to Judith and said haughtily, "I've finished my dinner, and I'd like to go to bed."

Judith stood up instantly. "Of course, darling," she said, and wheeled the chair out of the room.

CHAPTER X

THERE was a little awkward silence when they had gone.

Kim broke that silence by turning to Sylvie and saying harshly, "I warned you, Sylvie, that you mustn't excite her."

Peter said, before Andrew could voice his protest, "That's not quite fair, Kim. After all, Chloe lit into Sylvie."

"But Sylvie didn't have to fight back," snapped Kim. "She could have taken it, as the rest of us do."

"Sylvie's new here and hasn't learned yet to hold her tongue when Chloe gets difficult—" Laura began.

"Please, darling," Andrew broke in, "you mustn't say things like that about Chloe."

"Why not? If I go on keeping them inside my mind, I'll explode one day and tell her what I really think of her."

"But after all, darling, we are living here under her roof, existing on her bounty—"

"Existing is right—but I don't agree on the bounty part! We live here, yes—and you work like a dog for her, work for which any decent firm would be glad to pay you a living wage. Yet you stay here and work yourself to death and are given a pitiful allowance."

"If you're not happy here, Lolly, and if Andrew can be so well paid somewhere else, why do you go on living here?" drawled Kim. Sylvie saw the cynical light in his dark eyes as they rested on Laura.

"That's a good one," blazed Laura. "You'd like it if Andy and I would move out, wouldn't you? That would automatically eliminate us from any share in the estate. Grandad's will reads specifically that at Chloe's death the estate is to be divided between 'such of my descendants as are at that time living beneath my dear wife's roof.'"

Andrew stood up, thrust back his chair and bent above Laura, saying gently, but with a tone of authority in his voice, "Here, pull yourself together, darling. You mustn't get all worked up like this."

Laura got up and Andrew drew her out of the room, his arm about her.

Kim sat looking after them until the door had closed behind them. And then, with a little half articulate word that was an oath or an exclamation, he stalked out through one of the long French windows opening out on a terrace.

"I'm sorry, Sylvie," Peter said, "but I suppose you might as well get used to it. This sort of thing—well, it happens with a rather tiresome regularity."

Sylvie turned shocked eyes to him and asked incredulously, "You mean they fight like this all the time? That's awful!"

"It's not very pretty," Peter agreed.

"But why do you—why do any of them stand it?"

Peter grinned. "You heard Laura. My uncle, Chloe's husband, had a fantastic idea that all the family should live together under one roof—Forsythe Hall has always been home to all of us—and he was afraid that if we inherited the estate at his death, we might go off about business of our own and leave Chloe alone and the place go to rack and ruin, as almost all of the estates as old as this one have done. So he left the clause in his will that anyone who flouts Chloe's authority, or leaves the house to live somewhere else, automatically cuts himself off from his inheritance."

Sylvie was silent for a moment and then impulsively she asked, "But, Peter—somehow I can't quite see you wanting money so badly you'd stay on just for that."

"Then you've got me all wrong, Sylvie. I do want my share of Halcyon Island. I want it pretty badly. And I manage to keep pretty much on the outside of these family brawls, so I don't find them unbearable. Don't judge me too harshly, Sylvie. Some day I'll tell you why my share of the island is so terribly important to me."

AS they crossed the wide hall Peter was saying, "The garden and the grounds are especially beautiful in the moonlight. Will you need a wrap, do you think?"

Before Sylvie could answer him, Kim came out of the living-room, his face dark, as though anger and something stronger lay just below the surface.

"Sorry, Peter—but I think it is the privilege of the—er—happy bridegroom to show his bride around the family mansion, don't you? Come, my dear," he said, polite almost to the point of burlesque, offering his arm. Sylvie hesitated an instant and then, her color high, she went with him.

At the door she glanced back to see Peter still watching them, an odd look on his face.

"Don't be so disconsolate, my sweet," Kim said in her ear. "We'll be back in a little while. And good old Pete will be waiting for you. He's the faithful, long-suffering type."

There was something in the tone quite as much as in the words that flicked Sylvie.

"I know that you are angry with me," she told him hotly. "And I am sorry. But there is no reason why you should be—jabbing at me all the time with your eyes and with bitter, hurting words. I have been foolish, perhaps. I should never have hidden in your room on the ship. I should have let them send me back—" Her breath caught on a sob and for a moment she was still fighting hard to curb the tears that clogged her speech.

"Sorry," said Kim after a moment, and now his voice was more pleasant. "I didn't mean to be a complete heel."

"You were good and kind to me on the ship. It made me your slave. There isn't anything I wouldn't do to show to you that I am grateful," she stammered straight from her tormented young heart.

Kim made a little gesture with his hand.

"Oh, skip it, Sylvie. I don't want a slave."

"And you didn't want a wife, either—but you were burdened with one. That is why I feel so unhappy, so out of place here. If only your grandmother would have let me stay in New York! I was working hard, studying. Soon I might have been able to earn my own living—"

Kim looked annoyed. "There's no need for that, Sylvie. You will, of course, have an allowance from the estate. You are a Forsythe now, and we all have allowances."

"Then—I may go back to New York?"

"I'm afraid not, Sylvie—not right away," answered Kim. "Chloe's determined that you shall stay here—that you and I must give this marriage thing a try. After all, Sylvie, she's pretty old and she's not very strong and she's fought a good fight for the family. Couldn't you possibly be contented here for just a few months, and see how things develop?"

Sylvie was very still for a moment there in the shadow of one of the enormous white pillars that helped to support the roof of the long veranda. Kim stood where the light fell on his face. Sylvie was to remember, long afterward, that the moon was full that night and that in its white radiance the shadows on the lawn were inky black beneath the live-oaks, the azaleas like partially smothered pale flames beneath the silvery mystery of the Spanish moss.

"Is that what you wish, Kim?" she asked at last.

"I think it's the only possible way out," answered Kim.

Sylvie nodded. "Then that is what we will do," she said levelly. "I will stay as long as you want me to."

They went across the veranda, down the steps and across the lawn to the gravelled path to the garden. But it was obvious that he was not thinking of the garden, for suddenly he said:

"Look, Sylvie, how the dickens did you ever let that story get into the papers? That silly 'refugee bride' story? That was the thing that exploded all our plans. I'd managed to keep Chloe from knowing anything about our marriage until then."

"I am sorry about that," answered Sylvie and explained, without sparing herself in the least, how the story had been tricked out of her.

Kim nodded when she had finished and his brow cleared a little. "Oh, so that was it. It wasn't just a deliberate trick on your part to force my hand—"

Sylvie caught her breath and stood slim and straight, seeming to grow taller as she faced him there in the moonlight.

"You thought me capable of a low trick like that?" she gasped.

"Oh, haven't we had enough melodrama for one night? I'm sorry. I thought—well, never mind what I thought. I can understand how it all happened now, and I see I was wrong—and, if necessary, I apologize."

"It is not necessary that you apologize—but will you excuse me now? I—I am rather tired—"

Without waiting for him to answer she turned and went running across the dew-wet grass, across the veranda, and up the stairs to her room.

CHAPTER XI

SHE was sick with the humiliating discovery that Kim, whom she had adored so simply and so without question, was anything but heroic. She had taken it for granted that he had married her out of pity, and that he would always be tender and understanding. That he would so soon regret whatever impulse it was that had led him into that hasty marriage had never occurred to her. Or that he would be so frank in expressing that regret.

Dimly, she sensed that Kim was one who could not stand opposition. Captain Marsh and that man from the consular service—what was his name? Blake!—had protested the marriage. They had tried to talk Kim out of it; and Sylvie was already beginning to suspect that the best way to be certain that Kim did a thing was to try to talk him out of it. So it had not been so much chivalry and pity that had led him to that impulsive marriage, as opposition! He had been stubborn rather than chivalrous.

She allowed herself the luxury of crying herself to sleep. But when she awoke in the morning, she gave herself a stern shake, and a firm talking-to. She was in this thing, and she must find an honorable exit. And until that exit loomed up, she must conduct herself as her mother and her father would have wished.

She went downstairs to breakfast with her head up, her chin out, her eyes cool and alert.

She heard voices in the dining room and followed the sound. She found Andrew, Laura and Chloe at breakfast. Peter was just leaving and he gave her a friendly salute as he went.

"I am sorry that I am late," said Sylvie to Chloe. "I ask your forgiveness."

Chloe studied her almost curiously.

"My forgiveness for being late to breakfast?" she asked at last, her tone a trifle dry. "Well, my dear, I must compliment you on your manners. That's the first apology for such tardiness I've heard in this house in a long time."

The waitress came in with a tall, frosty glass of orange juice, crisp toast and a fresh cup which Chloe filled from the handsome silver urn before her.

As Sylvie drank the orange juice she saw that Judith's and Kim's plates were untouched. Chloe, following her glance, grinned like a wicked small boy.

"You ride, of course, Sylvie?" she suggested smoothly.

"Ride?" Sylvie repeated in bewilderment.

Chloe's eyebrows went up a little.

"Horses, I mean. Surely they have horses abroad?" she suggested blandly.

Sylvie nodded. "Oh, yes, they have horses—I've seen them," she answered sweetly.

"And you ride, of course?"

Sylvie shook her head. "I've never had the chance to try," she answered, and added frankly, "I'm sure I wouldn't like it, because I am afraid of horses."

Chloe snorted in frank disgust.

"Afraid of horses? Nonsense!" she sniffed. "Who ever heard of a Forsythe who didn't ride?"

Sylvie said quietly, "But you forget. I'm not a Forsythe—I'm a Landau. I've been a Landau for 19 years and a Forsythe for less than three months—"

Chloe spoke to Andrew.

"Have the stable boys saddle old Nellie and see she learns to ride," she ordered.

"But I have said I don't think I care to ride—" began Sylvie.

"Of course you do. How else will you keep up with things down here? Everybody rides. Let's hear no more about it," snapped Chloe as though the subject bored her.

Andrew spoke quickly. "You'll learn easily, Sylvie—and you'll find it's a lot of fun. Peter or I will help you—"

"Her husband will teach her to ride," said Chloe with the tone of one who gives a command that cannot possibly be ignored.

Andrew subsided, but he grinned heartenингly at Sylvie, just as there came the sound of hoofs on the drive and Kim and Judith galloped up, flushed and laughing and very handsome in their riding clothes.

Sylvie, watching them through the open French doors that led from the dining-room out on the wide gallery that ended at the edge of the drive, could not fail to see that they made a very handsome couple. That they were ideally suited to each other. Mutual interests, mutual tastes—Judith tall and splendid looking, Kim handsome and virile—they were so right for each other. Yet she, Sylvie, stood between them. And that small, valiant old tyrant at the head of the table said that there must never be a divorce in the family!

Kim and Judith came in, laughing, flushed with the vigor of their ride.

"Hello, everybody," said Kim gaily, and bent to kiss Chloe's withered cheek.

"You're late to breakfast," said Chloe with what tried to be sternness.

"Oh, so we are. Do you suppose the roof will fall in upon us?" asked Kim, laughingly.

"Your wife's manners are a vast improvement on your own," Chloe said crisply. "She at least apologized for her tardiness."

"My wife?" said Kim, as though startled to discover that there was such a person about. "Oh, yes, of course—my wife. Good-morning, Sylvie."

He took his place beside her, while Judith sat opposite, beside Laura. And Sylvie saw that a good deal of radiance had vanished from Judith's face.

"Sylvie doesn't ride, Kim," said Chloe.

"You will begin giving her lessons this morning."

It was a tone that obviously did not dream there could ever be the slightest thought of opposition. But Kim, to the surprise of all concerned, said courteously, "I'm sorry, Chloe—not this morning."

"It's quite all right," said Sylvie swiftly, but Chloe's voice spoke across her own.

"And why can't it be this morning?" persisted Chloe.

"Because Andrew and I have some plans," said Kim firmly. "After all, Chloe, Andy's carried the burdens of this place alone and unaided long enough. It's high time I gave him a hand."

CHLOE said to Kim: "Naturally, Sylvie is uneasy about horses if she doesn't know anything about them. But with old Nellie—why, she'll get over that in no time. And I expect you to see that she is an expert rider before the horse show in April."

Obviously there was nothing more to be said from her point of view. She pushed back her chair and stood up. A small, valiant figure in her old-fashioned black satin gown, her lace fichu and the old brooch that pinned it across her bosom, she addressed the Negro butler who hovered at her elbow.

"I'll be in the infirmary, Sam, for the next hour or so," she said, and the butler offered her his arm.

Judith pushed back her scarcely tasted breakfast and said, "I'll go with her, Sam."

The butler opened the door. With Chloe's rubber-tipped stick thumping a little on the polished floor, her other hand on Judith's arm, they went out and the door closed behind them.

Andrew said briskly, "Well, after all, I'm a working man—"

Laura rose and walked with him out on the gallery and stood beside him until the station wagon came around. Andrew bent and kissed Laura, got into the station wagon and drove off. She stood watching him for a moment, then moved along the gallery out of sight.

Sylvie was uncomfortably aware of being alone here with Kim, who sat staring into space, his coffee cooling rapidly before him. At last she said with a little housewifely gesture:

"May I get you some more coffee, Kim?"

Kim gave a little start as though he had only just remembered her presence here. He looked down at his coffee, pushed it away with a little frown of distaste and turned squarely around in his chair to face Sylvie, obviously wanting very much to say something and not quite sure just how to go about it.

"Yes, Kim?" said Sylvie after a moment.

"Sylvie, I have to ask something of you. I don't quite know just how to go about it."

"If there is anything at all I can do, Kim—I owe you so terribly much. And I don't mean just the money—that's the least important thing—"

"Let's skip that part of it," said Kim. "What I want to ask you is—you said last night you would stay on for a while and—well, try to be contented."

"I will, of course, Kim."

"Well, couldn't you just pretend that you still like me a little? You did on the boat, you know."

Sylvie caught her breath and was very still.

Kim made a little impatient gesture and went on before she could answer him, "Oh, I know I've behaved like a heel and no girl could possibly go on even liking a sap like me. But Chloe means an awful lot to me, Sylvie. There's very little I wouldn't do to make her happy and protect her from hurt. She wants to believe that you and I will fall in love with each other and that everything will end up in story-book fashion for us. Couldn't you just sort of—well play up a little and let her go on believing that?"

Sylvie sat very still, her hands clenched hard in her lap for a long moment. And then she said huskily, "What about Judith?"

Kim gave a little start and stared at her, his brows drawn together in a frown.

"Well, what about Judith?" he demanded almost belligerently.

"She's in love with you, and she'd make you the perfect wife."

CHAPTER XII

FOR a moment Kim wore an almost forlorn, very nearly frightened look. And then he said, "It's a little late to be thinking about that, I'm afraid. I've known Judith all my life. We grew up together. We are like brother and sister—" He broke off beneath the clear, steady look in her eyes and went on roughly, "Well, what about it? Are we going to give Chloe a few months of the peace and quiet to which she is entitled after all the years of struggle and heart-break she's had? Or are we going to break her heart all over again? It's up to you."

"Not quite," said Sylvie. "For my part, I will pretend to be as madly in love with you as I was on the boat. But I can't quite carry the act alone, you know."

"'As madly in love with me as you were on the boat'?" he repeated, as though not quite sure she had really said that.

She nodded, her eyes meeting his steadily. "But don't give it a second thought," she said quite clearly. "I imagine a lot of it was just hero-worship. You see, I was in such desperate trouble, and you were like a knight in shining armor who came to my rescue."

"And I spoiled all that? How and when?" demanded Kim, curious and not quite comfortable.

"I think it began when you were ashamed of me at the hotel," she told him steadily. "I can't really blame you. I did look shabby. But when you are a refugee—my kind of refugee — you don't have much choice about what you wear."

His hands closed over hers and he said huskily: "Sylvie, I'm sorry as the devil."

She slid her hand from under his and went on, "But I think what definitely finished it was last night when you admitted that you thought I had deliberately given that silly story to the papers in the hope of forcing you to bring me here. That cut pretty deeply—and I saw that if we were so far apart in our thoughts as that, we couldn't ever be in love—"

"Sylvie, please listen!"

"I haven't quite finished. I just wanted to say that if it will be any return at all, for what you have done for me, if it will please you—or add one small bit to Chloe's happiness—I will be the most loving, the most dutiful and devoted wife any man ever had—at least, publicly, anyway."

She slid back her chair as though avoiding any contact with him and evaded the hand he extended to help her. The dark color burned for a moment in his face and he said stiffly, "Thanks—I'm sure no one could ask for more than that. Now shall we go on with the riding lessons?"

Sylvie nodded and turned away. And so she missed seeing the curious look in his eyes as he followed her from the room.

Beyond the riding lessons, which took up an hour or more every morning, time hung heavily on Sylvie's hands. After she had mounted old Nellie, who had a gait like a rocking chair and felt that anything beyond a slow and dignified walk was unthinkable for one of her years, and circled the pasture for an hour or more she came back to the house, showered, donned one of the crisp, cool frocks that the very warm days demanded — and from then on found it hard to occupy herself.

So it was that she developed the habit of putting her own room to rights in the morning. She enjoyed making the bed, sweeping, dusting, putting everything in order. Until a morning when Judith came in just as she was finishing and said:

"I'm sorry, Sylvie, but I must ask you not to upset the routine of the servants. They have certain tasks to perform and you are interfering."

Sylvie straightened and stared at her, wide-eyed.

"You mean that because I wish to kill a little time—" she began incredulously, but Judith cut her short.

"There are other ways of killing time than by impairing the efficiency of the household staff," said Judith a trifle grandly. "The maids resent your cleaning your room. They think it is a reflection on them—that you don't feel they do it properly."

"That's being a bit silly, don't you think?"

"Perhaps—but one doesn't expect servants to be philosophers."

"I didn't mean the servants were being silly," said Sylvie quietly. "I meant that your using this as a subterfuge to pick a quarrel with me is silly—don't you think?"

Judith straightened and her eyes blazed.

"And why should I want to pick a quarrel with you?" she demanded.

"I imagine because you are in love with Kim and naturally jealous because I am his wife."

Judith was very still for a moment. Then her head went up and a dark, unbecoming color stained her cheeks.

"You're not his wife," she said savagely, her tone making a whiplash of the words. "You're just the cheap little peasant who tricked him into standing beside her and going through a marriage ceremony. You're not really his wife—you'll never be! Kim loves me—and he'll always love me. We belong together, Kim and I. You nor nobody else can come between us—ever!"

She closed the door behind her, sharply, and Sylvie heard her swift feet going down the long hall.

There was a gentle rap at the door. Sylvie turned. It was Laura who stood on the threshold. She carried an ivory basket, out of which spilled exquisitely fine nainsook and the tiniest lace edging.

"Come on down in the garden, Sylvie, and let's sew and gossip and invite our souls," suggested Laura, and Sylvie was glad to go.

Out on the lawn there was a giant live-oak tree whose great branches spread wide over a corner of the garden. Here there were wicker chairs, and a broad-topped table where the family had tea unless it was raining, which in this friendly, gracious climate was not often.

Sylvie watched with secret amusement while Laura struggled with the dainty sacque. And then she said, "Here, let me. I love working on scraps like that."

"I hoped you'd say something like that," admitted Laura frankly, and handed over the sewing. "I can't sew for sour apples—and I had the most heavenly layette all picked out, complete to the last safety pin and box of talcum. All I had to do was write a cheque. But Chloe all but had a stroke at the bare thought of a Forsythe being swaddled in anything but something that bore the stitches his own mother had put in."

"Let me make them, Laura—I'd love it. I haven't anything at all to do, and I'm used to working. The time goes so slowly."

SYLVIE worked happily and contentedly, setting the tiny, even stitches so that the little sacque grew beneath her fingers. Laura, lying back in her chair, watched her curiously and said: "D'you know, Sylvie—I wonder about you? What are you really like—inside, I mean? Not the composed, quiet, almost mousey youngster who startles me out of my back teeth now and then by giving Chloe 'what for' when she gets particularly outrageous. But if things were different—if, as the darkies say, you 'had your druthers'—what would you be like?"

Sylvie looked up, laughing a little, though the ever-present shadow of panic was at the back of her eyes.

"If I had my druthers? What in the world does that mean?"

"Oh, the darkies will say, 'I don't wanna do that. I'd druther do somethin' else. And when they say 'if I had my druthers' they mean if I could do what I want to do or be what I want to be. See? It's very simple, and very expressive. It just means if you had your choice of things to be and do—what would you 'druther' do?"

Sylvie looked up straight into Laura's intent face and said quietly, "Then I think I'd 'druther' be right where you are—a happy and beloved wife. Loving and being loved. That seems to me the loveliest thing in the world."

"Never trust love, Sylvie," Laura said swiftly. "It can hurt you so terribly!"

"Oh, Laura, you don't mean that! You can't!"

Laura shook her head and for a moment her eyes were almost bleak. Then she said, "I don't quite know why, Sylvie—but I'm going to tell you something that almost nobody else knows. I didn't love Andy when I married him. I was breaking my heart for someone else. A man I met on a blind date with a crowd of boys and girls. He was older than we were and—well, I took one look at the man and did a nosedive. I was simply mad about him. I only existed when I was with him, or when I was hurrying to meet him. I can see now that was probably what made him grow tired of me so soon. I must have been rather sticky, like an overdose of chocolate creams. But—well, he walked out on me, with the casual statement that he was married and that it had been fun and he was sorry to be going—but then, life was like that!"

"Oh, darling," said Sylvie, sick with pain for that trusting young girl out of which this cynical Laura had grown.

Laura nodded, smiling a little. "Tragic, wasn't it? I was sure that my life had ended. I was not quite 18. I was bitter on the whole world—at first I wanted to die. But I was strong and healthy and—well, I went on living. And gradually I decided, when it began to be bruited about that I was developing into a beauty, that I would avenge myself on the whole race of men. I'd be a siren. I'd make them adore me, crawl at my feet. Then I'd spurn them with the toe of my slipper. And then Andy came along. I knew who he was—one of the romantic, almost legendary Forsythes of Halcyon Island. I knew I'd never have another chance as good. So when Andy asked me to marry him, I managed a maidenly blush, stammered, 'This is so sudden,' and tumbled into his arms."

CHAPTER XIII

SHE was silent for a moment, as though going back in her thoughts over that time when she had wanted to avenge her heartache by making men suffer.

"Of course," she went on at last, "I wasn't in the least in love with Andy at the time. He bored me stiff. I could hardly keep from yawning in his face, and I worked all sorts of subterfuges to avoid being alone with him or to keep him from making love to me. I had a few anxious moments before the wedding, but I went through with it. When Andy and I were alone in the drawing-room on the train en route for our honeymoon, he told me frankly he knew that I wasn't in love with him, but that he loved me enough to wait for my love; that if I wanted to be free, after I'd given it a trial, then I could be. I didn't know then, as I know now, that he was taking a terrific chance; that if I had run out on him, Chloe would have had convulsions. Anyway, that's how it all began. I don't quite know when I fell in love with Andy—really in love, I mean. But then I knew that other had been just a mirage. Something that hadn't been real."

"Nobody could help loving Andy," Sylvie said. "He's so good and kind and gentle."

Laura nodded. "So you see, you can never trust love—what we mistake as love. That crazy, wild excitement that comes when you are very young and he is a god-like young being and the world seems built just for the two of you. The chances are 10 to 1 that if you escape from that wild infatuation and meet the man 10 years later you'll feel like going down on your knees and thanking heaven that you were rescued from him."

Sylvie was silent for a long moment, and then she said huskily, "Thank you for telling me, Laura."

"Sylvie—are you in love with Kim?" asked Laura.

Sylvie looked up at her and answered frankly: "I don't know. I think I was for a while there on the boat—or maybe that was just gratitude because he had been so wonderfully kind to me. I'm afraid I wouldn't know whether it was love or not. And later—since I've been here—I don't quite know, Laura. I can't make up my mind what I should do. I owe Kim—and all of you—so much because you've taken me in and closed that—that door into something I can't even talk about, that I try not to remember. But I know Kim's not in love with me—that he should be married to Judith."

Laura nodded in agreement.

"They are cousins, too, aren't they?" Sylvie asked curiously.

"No—Judith's not really a relation at all," answered Laura. "She's the granddaughter of Chloe's best girl friend. Chloe and Sally were schoolmates. They lost track of each other after they were married. But when Sally's daughter was very ill and knew she couldn't live, she wrote to Chloe. There was no money and Judith's father had died, and the mother was in quite a state of mind. Judith was 11. Chloe sent for her and brought her here, and here she's been ever since."

"Then—except for me—there's no reason why they should not marry," said Sylvie.

"None at all, I suppose—except that Kim has known Judith for years and never shown the slightest desire to marry her," answered Laura.

"Maybe she wasn't so beautiful when Kim went away the last time. He was gone a year. A girl can grow up and develop a lot in that time," Sylvie pointed out.

"There's that, of course," Laura admitted. Then suddenly she leaned forward and laid a hand on Sylvie's knee, saying, "Sylvie, are you in love with someone else? Perhaps someone who wasn't able to get out of that horror over there?"

"Oh, no!"

"Then why don't you make a play for Kim? You are married to him—legally, if not spiritually! That gives you a running start on anybody else who might be casting sheep's eyes at him—I mean Judith, of course. Kim has a lot of charm, when he cares to exert it. Of course, I know he can be very trying at times—but, what the heck! Who is perfect? He's a good, sound possibility as a husband, needing only a few good, stout polishing licks from the right sort of wife to make him a model."

"Do you think I'm the right sort of wife? For Kim, I mean?"

"There isn't the slightest doubt of it! You are exactly what Kim needs—and if you just use a little of the sort of tact and discretion that any smart girl has, you can make him come crawling to you, begging you to be really his wife."

Sylvie laughed. "Kim asked me a little while ago to sort of pretend, before Chloe, that we were falling in love," she confessed. "He thought it might make her happy."

"And, unless I very much miss my guess, it will make you and Kim happy, too—eventually!" Laura answered.

Sylvie was introduced to the Forsythes' friends at a barbecue. A thoroughly southern and quite delightful affair that took place in a beautiful grove of live-oaks between the packing shed and the bathing beach.

The scene was fascinating to Sylvie. A large trench had been dug and at the bottom of it glowed beds of live coals. Above these, slabs of meat were being turned on spits. The feeding of the fires, to keep them at exactly the right degree of heat, seemed to be quite an art, and half a dozen Negro boys were intent on that task. Below the turning spits, iron gratings lay across the trench and large pieces of meat were cooking there, being basted now and then with a highly seasoned sauce.

Three Negro women stood above an enormous black pot and the old Negro man who basted the barbecuing meat came now and then to sniff the contents of the pot, to add a mysterious scrap of seasoning, a pinch of this, a spoonful of that. That was the famous Brunswick stew, that most difficult of southern dishes that apparently must be cooked out of doors, in a huge black pot on a crisp midwinter morning, to have the proper flavor and succulence.

At the other end of the grove, an outdoor oven provided space for great pans of sizzling hot cooking fat. There were mounds of freshly cleaned fish, wrapped neatly, waiting to be laid in the pans "when de white folks is ready fo' dinner." With the fish went tiny cakes no larger than one's hand, made of corn meal and water, seasoned with onion.

"Hush puppies," Peter explained when Sylvie asked. When she blinked and loked more puzzled still, he laughed and went on to explain. "The name goes 'way back in southern history. It seems that there are now, and always have been, lots of dogs and puppies at outdoor picnics like these. They become a nuisance to the cooks—and so some bright individual conceived the idea of cooking these small cakes along with the fish and tossing one occasionally to the puppies to stop their barking—thus, 'hush puppies'."

Sylvie, eating one of the delectable cakes, shook her head. "They're much too good to be thrown to the dogs," she said firmly, "much as I like dogs."

Sylvie was astounded at the number of guests. There must have been 200 or more.

To her, fresh from the horror of a Europe torn and bleeding, there was something unreal about this peaceful scene. People speaking their minds, without lowering their voices or looking fearfully over a shoulder lest an enemy overhear; people who were well dressed and well fed; the children, plump and cared-for.

Suddenly, she was crying; hidden behind one of the giant live-oaks where no one could see her. Crying for the memories she could never tear out of her heart.

Kim said, behind her, "Oh, here you are. I've been looking—" And then, sharply, "Sylvie, you're crying. What's the matter?"

Sylvie fought for composure, her face hidden from Kim. "I'm a fool, but suddenly I realized how beautiful all this was. And I remembered the things I had seen—before Lisbon. And—oh, Kim, that mustn't ever happen over here!"

Kim caught her slim shoulders and gave her a gentle shake. "Snap out of it, youngster," he said. "You mustn't give way. Come on; dinner's ready!"

He gave her time to dry her eyes, to apply first aid by means of the compact and lipstick in the pocket of her white sports frock, before he led her out to where an enormous table had been built by laying boards over trestles, so that there was room for everybody.

When it was over and the tables were being cleared, Chloe came to Kim and Sylvie and said. "My dears, come with me. Some guests here that you haven't met."

With a hand through Sylvie's arm, her other hand resting on Kim's arm, she drew them to where a man and a woman sat on a bench, surrounded by a number of others.

The woman was tall, plump and cheerful. Her eyes were blue and shining with happiness behind her glasses. The man was taller, stooped a little his hair snowy white and thick. He wore no glasses and his eyes were gray and merry.

"Anson and Mary," said Chloe, "these are my children, Sylvie and Kim. You've been married 50 years today. They've been married less than six months. What can you tell them that will make them realize the joy it means to spend 50 years with one partner?"

Mary smiled at her husband and put out a hand to Sylvie. A hand that was firm, if a little rough and work-stained.

"There's really not much of a trick to it, child," said Mary, her eyes brimming with happy laughter. "The main thing you have to remember is that if you give in to him in all the little things, he'll have to give in to you in all the big things! And never show him a bill, or argue with him, until after you've fed him. I reckon that's one of the surest ways of losing your husband—not keeping him well fed and his buttons sewed on."

"Anson," Kim said, "do we have to take that lying down?"

"No, sir, we don't!" said Anson firmly. "I'd say the first thing for you to learn, son, would be to kind of confuse her about the things that's big and them that's little. If you want to do something mighty bad, and she don't want you to, try to convince her you don't want to at all. Chances are she'll insist on it—"

"Now this is too bad of you, Anson and Mary," Chloe broke in. "I brought them here so you could give them good advice on how to stay married and be happy and live a good, useful life together, as you have done."

Anson nodded and looked straight at Sylvie. His eyes were no longer twinkling and merry. "She's got good stuff in her, Chloe," he said quietly. "You don't need to worry about her. And Kim—well, Kim's steady, too, once he sets his mind to it. Seems as if they'd make a mighty good team, pulling together. That's about what marriage is — good team-work. Being kind, not being too selfish to realize the other part of the team has a right to her own way part of the time."

Mary laughed, a friendly, heartwarming little chuckle, and said, "It's taking him a heap of words to say it. But it all boils down to just loving each other and always remembering that, even when you are tired and cross and frightened, because now and then life's got a way of seeming almost more than a body can stand. I reckon they'll get along all right, Chloe."

Sylvie said huskily, "Thank you." Impulsively she bent and kissed that almost plump, unwrinkled cheek.

"You're real sweet, my dear," Mary said, patting her shoulder. "Kim's a lucky boy."

Anson shook Sylvie's hand warmly and echoed, "He is that."

Sylvie could not meet Kim's eyes. He couldn't possibly be pleased at this sort of thing; it must have seemed terribly empty. Yet if he had loved her—if they had been what they seemed to these kind, gentle people, a happily married bride and groom—how sweet and tender the little scene would have been.

Chloe nodded in complete satisfaction. This was what she wanted Kim and Sylvie to hear. She hoped they would tuck the memory of it away in their hearts; and she hoped that one day Kim and Sylvie would sit here where this couple sat, serene and at peace with the world, behind them 50 golden years of life and love and happiness.

As they moved away from the couple, Sylvie said, "They're sweet. Who are they? Relatives?"

"Anson was my husband's best friend," answered Chloe, "and overseer

Sylvie had walked almost a mile when she heard the clatter of hoofs down the path, and Peter rode around a curve in the path, leading Golden boy.

of the estate. Mary taught school here on the island. She and I wept many a tear—yes, and had many a laugh, too—in the years immediately after I came to the island, a bride, scared to death of the responsibilities that suddenly tumbled on my shoulders."

CHAPTER XIV

THEY were finishing breakfast the next morning when Chloe said, "You'll come with me to the infirmary this morning, Sylvie. You might as well begin learning."

Judith looked up sharply.

"But, Chloe, I'm ready to go with you—as I always am," she protested.

"Of course you are, my dear," agreed Chloe. "But it is time Kim's wife began to understand something about the routine of life at Halcyon. After all, she and Laura will succeed me—and I'm afraid Laura hasn't—er—the temperament for the infirmary."

Kim looked swiftly at Chloe and then at Judith. He started to say something, thought better of it, and scowled at his plate.

"Come, my dear," Chloe said to Sylvie. To Judith she added, "I'm sure you'll be glad of a morning to yourself, my dear. Why don't you go for a ride? Or perhaps over to the mainland for some shopping?"

Judith's eyes met Chloe's with an angry flash as she said composedly, "Thank you—but I still have plenty to do here, even if I am to be excused from the infirmary hour."

"As you wish, my dear," said Chloe pleasantly, and walked out of the room with Sylvie beside her.

Their way led along the passage to the back of the house, the old butler going ahead and holding the doors open as Chloe, one hand on Sylvie's arm, the other tap-tapping with her stick, followed him. They crossed the kitchen, an enormous room with an open fireplace that was in reality a place for cooking, but there was also a huge electric range, an old-fashioned coal and wood range; an electric icebox seemed to Sylvie to fill a whole side of one wall.

As she and Chloe crossed the room, an old Negro woman, very fat, her graying hair partly hidden beneath a gaily flowered bandanna, her percale dress protected by a voluminous white apron, bobbed a little old-fashioned curtsey and said, "Good mornin', Miss Chloe, honey. I hopes I sees you well this mornin'."

"Good morning, Lucindy," said Chloe with every evidence of affectionate warmth. "Sylvie, my dear, this is Lucindy—my faithful friend. Lucindy, this is Mr. Kim's wife."

"Yassum, Miss Chloe. I knows it. I been seein' her around. She's sho' pretty—but then us allus knowed Marse Kim goin' to find him the prettiest gal in the world before he git married."

"Thank you, Lucindy," said Sylvie warmly.

"This here's my gal, Pansy Mae," Lucindy introduced a tall, very neat woman in her middle thirties. "And this is Mabelle." She indicated a younger woman. "And my worthless gran'child, Hattie. Hattie's yo' maid, Miss Sylvie, honey. Effen she don't do right, yo' tell me, an' I gwine whip her good."

Sylvie laughed. Hattie put a hand over her mouth lest her grandmother think her own answering laughter unseemly.

"Hattie's very good, Lucindy. You don't need to worry about her!" said Sylvie.

Lucindy turned on Hattie so suddenly that the girl jumped, a trifle guiltily. "Yo' hear that, gal?" demanded Lucindy. "Don't yo' ever do nothin' to make Miss Sylvie change her mind—you hear me?"

"Yessum, Grannie—I hears you," said Hattie dutifully.

Chloe chuckled and she and Sylvie went on out of the kitchen, across a back veranda and down a flagged walk that led through the kitchen garden. Eventually they came to an ancient two-roomed cabin built of a cement-like substance with bits of shell crushed into it.

"Tabby brick," explained Chloe, tapping the wall of the cabin. "Cement is a fairly modern invention—yet the Spaniards who first settled this part of the country built missions and houses of this sort of stuff; a mixture of sand and some other element that forms it into concrete-like stuff. The crushed shells were added either for strength or for beauty, it's not quite certain which. But all up and down the chain of islands along the coast, and on the mainland, there are ruins of tabby brick."

She unlocked an old-fashioned padlock that held the door shut and Sylvie pushed it open. The interior of the cabin had been white-washed and made as antiseptic as was possible. There was a distinct odor of disinfectant lingering on the fragrant morning air. There was an old-fashioned flat-topped desk with a chair before it; there were two or three other chairs, straight-backed, uncushioned, along the wall. And all around the walls there were glass-enclosed shelves on which were bottles of medicine and all the essentials of first aid.

Chloe heaved herself into the chair beside the desk and pushed back the cuffs of her long sleeves.

"Let them in, Sylvie. I imagine they are waiting out there by the road."

Sylvie saw that she and Chloe had entered the cabin from the rear; that its front door faced on the road. It was latched and there was a bar across it. She drew back the bar, unlatched the door and threw it open.

BEFORE her there was a narrow winding lane, shaded by the lovely old oaks. Beneath the oaks there were a few benches, and on these benches were half a dozen Negro men and women and several children. As she opened the door of the infirmary they rose and came forward.

Sylvie smiled at them and said, "I think it would be better if you just came in one at a time. It would give us a better chance to see what's wrong with you."

There was a submissive murmur of "Yessum," and then they hung back, no one quite willing to be the first. Sylvie's eyes swept them and saw a tall young woman, carrying a baby in her arms.

"Suppose you come first," Sylvie said gently. "Your baby is sick?"

The woman came toward her like a sleepwalker.

"He gwine die," she said sombrely.

"Oh, no!" said Sylvie in swift denial, looking down at the tiny black satin face wrinkled and still against the mother's arm.

"He gwine die," repeated the mother in a tone that held no shred of hope; a tone so dead that Sylvie could not repress a little shudder. "He been crossed. That no-good Essie gal done put a curse on him—'cause she want his pappy."

Chloe said swiftly, "Nonsense, Cleo! Nonsense! I've tried to tell you over and over again that there is no such thing as curses—or 'crosses' that kill people. Essie's gone. She's left the island—"

"This here in bed with the baby this mornin'," said Cleo tonelessly, placing on the desk a repulsive little doll-like thing of wax with bits of hair and a chicken feather or two stuck to it. "The baby gwine die."

"Of course he is," Chloe agreed, "if you don't do something for him. Don't sit there and moan! The baby's going to be all right. Now, I don't want to hear any more nonsense about voodoo and curses."

She took the baby, examined him expertly, and put him back in his mother's arms. He had not stirred except once to whimper like a small frightened kitten.

Chloe scribbled something on a pad, then turned to Sylvie.

"See if Mose is out there," she ordered.

Sylvie went to the door. "Is there someone named Mose here?" she called. The question was repeated to the end of the line, where a young giant, clad in ragged overalls and what might once have been a shirt, heaved himself up from a prone position in the grass and grinned ingratiatingly.

"Yessum—I's Mose," he ackowledged.

Chloe handed Sylvie the paper on which she had written. "Tell Mose to take Cleo to the mainland immediately and to the hospital. This note will admit her and the baby," she said.

Others came in a steady stream. Chloe faced them all, brisk, capable, cheerful, kind but firm. She handed over tablets, doses of medicine called for by simple ailments. She gave strict advice and, when the last lingerer outside the door had been attended to, she sighed heavily and rested her head on her hand.

"We'll lock up, Sylvie," she said then. "I'm afraid I'm a little tired."

"Of course you are," answered Sylvie as she closed and barred the door. "How did you ever start doing this sort of thing? Isn't there a doctor on the island?"

"Of course—a very good one," answered Chloe, "and most of the people in the village go to him. But the house servants here and some of the field hands refuse to go to the village. When I first came here, there was no doctor here. There were only about 100 people here. Descendants, every one of them, of the slaves that had built Halcyon. And 60 years ago the mistress of a plantation, if she took her duties seriously as a married woman was expected to do in those days, looked after the physical as well as the spiritual needs of the servants on her place."

She smiled faintly and her eyes twinkled a little.

"I wasn't quite 18," she said. "I had been spoiled at home—the only girl in a family of boys. My father was furious at the idea of my coming to Halcyon to live. But I think he was even more furious when I took my six-months engagement as a time to prepare for what I knew awaited me here. I studied with our family physician, took what nowadays would be called a first aid course, I suppose."

When Sylvie helped her to her feet, Chloe patted her arm gently and said, "Now another girl has come to Halcyon to take over my work. I'm glad it is you, my dear."

"Oh, but I'm not—not good enough. I'm not fine enough, and strong— as you are—"

Chloe shook her head. "Somehow, Sylvie, you remind me very much of what I was like at your age. Perhaps I'm flattering myself, for you're very sweet and very pretty—much prettier than I was. You will do a fine job, my dear."

"But Andy is older than Kim. Andy has managed the place so long, surely it should be Andy and Laura—not Kim and I—who try to follow in your footsteps, Chloe," protested Sylvie.

Chloe sniffed. "Andy's a good boy—a fine man. I'm very fond of him," she said, with the tone of one who wishes to give credit where credit is due. "But Laura hates Halcyon. Andy is not as devoted to it as he might be. Andy has always wanted to be a lawyer. He made a fine record at law school and he has several excellent opportunities if he ever wants to leave the island. No, my dear, Laura and Andy will be off in a fine cloud of dust before I'm comfortably settled in my grave! It will be you and Kim who carry on here."

Sylvie drew a long, hard breath.

"But, Chloe, you are forgetting," she said after a moment. "Kim doesn't love me."

"But you love him," Chloe said quietly.

CHAPTER XV

SYLVIE flushed, but her eyes met Chloe's straightly. "I'm not sure, Chloe. On the ship, I just about worshipped him. He was a knight in shining armor who had dashed up to rescue me from something that doesn't bear thinking about. But that was hero-worship and gratitude. I'm not sure how much of it was love."

"And since you've come here to the island, you are beginning to think that you never loved him and never could."

"I—yes, that's so," Sylvie confessed.

"But you see, child, you and Kim don't really know each other," said Chloe gently. "Will you do something for me, Sylvie?"

"Anything at all that is in my power," answered Sylvie.

"Then stay here quietly, without worrying or probing your thoughts or trying to make any plans for the future, for six months. Stay merely as a guest. A beloved, very welcome guest. Nobody will bother you about Kim. Of course, people know that you are married to him, and I daresay everybody outside the immediate family thinks you madly in love with each other. Well, let 'em go on thinking that. But don't worry about it. Just give yourself and Kim time to get acquainted with each other. At the end of that time, if you are not in love with each other, if you want to be free of each other, I shall offer no protest."

"You mean you'd permit a divorce?"

Chloe's jaw hardened a little beneath the soft, wrinkled flesh and she thumped her stick on the floor, saying, "A divorce won't be necessary. An annulment is all that will be required. Even that I should deplore, bitterly."

Sylvie nodded and after a moment she asked impulsively, "What about Judith?"

Chloe looked up at her sharply. "Well, what about her?" she challenged.

"You must know that she's in love with Kim."

"Of course—we all know that. She's never made much of a secret of it—"

"And Kim loves her," Sylvie finished.

Chloe shook her head. "That, my dear, is where you are wrong. He's known Judith all his life—why would he wait to fall in love with her now? And even if he did, I'd never allow him to marry her. They are too much alike—too proud, too high-spirited, stiff-necked. They'd fight like cats and dogs. No, that must never happen—not Kim and Judith! There'd be no peace nor happiness for either of them, married to each other. It's unthinkable."

And so Sylvie settled down at Halcyon Hall for a six months period that would decide whether she was to be really Mrs. Kimball Forsythe or just Sylvie Landau, free of any matrimonial entanglements.

Kim was charming to her. Thoughtful, considerate, polite at all times. But his manner with Judith was so entirely different that Sylvie could not miss the contrast. With Judith he was completely at ease; impudently teasing, matter of fact, casual. They quarrelled furiously, laughed a great deal, rode together, found much in common that seemed entirely unintelligible to Sylvie, who, for her own part, tried not to be a nuisance or to spoil their fun in any way.

Peter had been away on business since before the barbecue and Sylvie was a little startled at the way her heart leaped in her breast the first night that he was at home and she came face to face with him in the drawing-room before dinner.

The others were present and Peter was recounting some adventure he had on his journey. They were all laughing and talking at once, so that Sylvie had time to compose herself a little and to be frightened of that sudden jumping of her heart at the sound of Peter's voice.

Now that Sylvie had learned to ride fairly well, Kim had discontinued the daily lessons, and she knew in her heart that he was glad he could do this. In the weeks since she had been here on the island they were no closer to friendship than they had been on board the ship before that hour when they had stood before the captain and taken on those vows that each had known at the moment were meaningless.

On a perfect early spring morning—mid-January, which was spring at Halcyon—she rode out alone after breakfast. There were miles of cleverly twisting, narrow bridle paths through the island, and she rode carefully, sniffing the air with delight, loving its fragrant caress on her cheek.

All about her the woods were alive with the magic of awakening earth. She stopped suddenly and caught her breath in delight. For at the left of the road, she caught the glimmer of something creamy-white. A tree in blossom so lovely that she felt she must see it more closely.

Impulsively, she slid out of the saddle and forced her way through the thick underbrush until she came to a tiny clearing. And here not one but five trees stood in that creamy-white perfection, grouped around a pile of rubble that had once been a chimney such as the Negroes call "stick-and-dirt." The trees were pear trees and somehow they had managed to survive neglect and the encroaching forest to bloom in this exquisite beauty, their branches thickly furred with the white pompons of blossom, not a leaf yet visible.

Sylvie was touched almost to the point of tears. There was something so patient, so loyal, so enduring about the sight of those gnarled old trees, guarding what had once been a home; where the man or woman who had planted these trees had lived and, perhaps, had died, while the trees lived on, a silent testimonial to that man or woman.

Beyond the clearing and the pear trees she saw where a crab-apple tree spread its fragrant pinky skirts; beyond, a small group of dogwood trees in bloom; and everywhere that she looked, flinging yellow fingers in greedy delight were tendrils of fragrant jasmine. Overhead the sky was intensely blue; across it floated white puffballs of clouds that were like cotton wool. All about her the woods were made vocal with the song of birds, their darting flight a thing to enchant the eye.

It was so beautiful that when she turned to go back to the bridle path and a movement almost under her boot caught her eye, and she looked down to see a small brown snake staring straight up at her, she was not frightened. Instead of screaming and jumping backward, she merely stood perfectly still looking down at the snake—and after an instant in which it sensed its safety, it glided away beneath the pile of rubble that had once been the chimney.

Sylvie walked back to the path, smiling at herself a little because she had been so completely at peace with the world that she had not even been afraid of the snake, and the attempt to kill it had never entered her mind. There was so much of slaughter going on in the world—what difference did it make if one small snake, even if he was, as she suspected, one of the deadly ground-rattlers of which she had been warned, escaped with his life? He had offered her no harm—and she had stood aside and said in effect "Pass with your life, friend!"

She was jostled out of her peaceful mood when she reached the path and saw that her horse was gone. She remembered now, when it was too late, that Kim had warned her repeatedly never to leave her horse unless the reins had been drawn over his head and tied, or left dangling.

"He'll stand for hours," Kim had told her when the beautiful chestnut had been assigned as her mount, "if you trail the reins over his head. But if you leave them on his neck, he'll go off and leave you."

So that was what had happened. Golden Boy had decided it was time to go home and he had gone. She had at least three miles to walk—and her riding habit and boots were not meant for long walking on a pleasant morning like this. But she shrugged philosophically and set out.

SHE had walked almost a mile and was resting beside the road when she heard the clatter of hoofs down the path and Peter rode around a curve in the path, leading Golden Boy. She saw that Peter's face was white and anxious. As he rode up and swung out of the saddle, he cried, "Are you hurt, Sylvie? Did the brute throw you?"

Sylvie laughed ruefully.

"No, it was my fault. I forgot to dangle the reins the way Kim told me—and Golden Boy got tired of waiting and went home," she explained.

"Thank the Lord!" Peter's tone was sharp with relief. "I was afraid you'd been thrown—hurt—" He checked himself and managed a smile.

"I hope Golden Boy didn't upset everybody at the house—I mean did he go all the way home?" asked Sylvie anxiously.

"No, I met him at the junction of the bridle path and the road to the packing shed," answered Peter. "I didn't stop to sound the alarm. I just hurried to find you."

Sylvie said gratefully, "You are good to worry about me, Peter—you are so very kind to me."

Peter looked at her straightly and she saw a little white line etch itself about his mouth, and his eyes met hers steadily and gravely with something hidden in their depths that brought a soft flood of color to her cheek.

"It's not a bit of a chore to be kind to you, Sylvie," he told her. "And I worry about you on the slightest provocation."

Sylvie found it impossible to answer him because the thing she had glimpsed in his eyes made her strangely uneasy.

"I—thank you, Peter," she stammered after a moment, and turned to Golden Boy.

Peter held his hand for her. She put the toe of her boot into it, as Kim had taught her, and mounted swiftly and easily.

"A good strong puff of wind would blow you away, Sylvie—did you know that?" asked Peter when he had swung himself up in the saddle on his fine dark gray mount. "You're so little and frail looking. That's another thing I worry about. You aren't getting enough vitamins maybe."

He tried to be casual about it, but his eyes were worried and anxious.

Sylvie answered him swiftly, "I'm not frail at all, Peter. You mustn't worry about me—"

Peter, his lean, sensitive face straight ahead, his eyes almost grim, said harshly, "Suppose I like worrying about you?"

"But that's silly. You mustn't. I'm quite all right. I'm terribly fortunate to have found such a haven. Kim is having private detectives trace my mother's people, and as soon as we have lived up to the letter of Chloe's bargain with us, I can go to them."

"You'd like that, Sylvie?"

She straightened a little in the saddle and looked about her at the heart-breaking loveliness of the scene, and then she shook her head.

"No," she told him quite honestly. "I'd hate leaving Halcyon. I love it—it's an enchanted country. But it would be nice to have people to whom I belong, people who belong to me—not to be an alien."

"Now that, Sylvie, you could never be," said Peter almost sharply. "An alien! What a word! You're an American and this is home. Every inch of this country is yours. Let's not hear any more nonsense about your being an alien."

Impulsively Sylvie leaned forward and touched his hand with the tips of her fingers and, her cheeks flushed, her eyes bright, she said swiftly "Peter, thank you for that—you're sweet."

Peter almost jerked his hand from under hers. He shook the reins on his horse's neck and, with that taut white line about his mouth, said almost curtly, "Skip it!"

Sylvie straightened, a little hurt at his tone and his manner. But before she could say anything he went on briskly:

"Remember I told you once that some day I'd tell you why it is so terribly important that I have my share of the Halcyon estate?"

"Yes, I do remember, Peter," answered Sylvie.

"Well, there'll probably never be a better time—if you're not tired?"

"Of course I'm not tired. I'd love to know, Peter—because I know things aren't too pleasant for you here. I've wondered—you're not the type to endure a lot of unpleasantness just for the sake of a little money," said Sylvie frankly.

He grinned wryly. "Close to two millions, net, is scarcely a little money, my angel! But come and I'll show you why it is so important to me."

He led the way along the bridle path which was at this point not wide enough for two to ride abreast. About two miles further on, he turned from the path into a line that led down toward the sea. On either side the lane was bordered by trees so that they rode through a leafy tunnel, the branches of the smaller trees joining over their heads.

They came out of the lane to face the river, curling down to meet the sea. And before them lay an ancient two-storeyed house of the inevitable tabby brick. It was thickly grown with ground-ivy and yellow jasmine. Beyond the house there was a modern red-painted barn and outbuildings. Surrounding the house and barn and outbuildings were plowed fields. Three men were plowing as Sylvie and Peter came up. The house fronted the river, and here was shrubbery of the sort that practically surrounded Halcyon Hall; there was also a garden of old-fashioned perennials.

CHAPTER XVI

THE house was a pleasant, substantial lookng place with verandas across the front and two sides. Two little boys in overalls, washed to pale blue, played under a mulberry tree. As Sylvie and Peter drew rein just beyond the limits of the garden, a woman, who looked comfortable and pleasant like the house, came to the back door and called to the two little boys, who stopped their play and ran eagerly to the door.

Peter lifted his head and sniffed.

"Gingerbread!" He recognized the spicy smell that drifted out to them. "And there'll be a stone crock filled with sweet milk heavy with cream in the cellar—and all of a sudden, I know I'm hungry. Come on, Sylvie—it's high time you made the acquaintance of hot gingerbread and ice-cold, creamy milk."

He knotted his horse's reins about a hitching post in the shape of a grinning small black boy whose once scarlet coat had faded to pink, but whose grin was as infectious as when it had first left the hands of the man who made it.

He swung Sylvie down, knotted Golden Boy's reins securely and, with his hand through Sylvie's arm, drew her up the bricked path that bisected the garden. They went around to the back door, where the two little boys were sitting on the doorstep, hot gingerbread in one hand, mugs of milk in the other.

The little boys, obviously twins about five years old, crowed with delight at sight of Peter. "Hey, Ma," they shouted, "here's Mr. Peter."

"Hiya, fellers," Peter greeted them. "This is Miss Sylvie—a friend of yours."

The two little boys stood up and bobbed brown sleek heads, and said without hesitation, grinning widely, "Hello!"

"Hello, boys," said Sylvie, smiling at them.

The woman came hurrying to the porch now, wiping her hands on her clean gingham apron and saying hospitably, "Well, I do declare, Mr. Peter, it's a real sight to see you—but I'm afraid you caught me all of a jumble, being that this is baking day."

Peter's eyes twinkled a little. "Of course it's baking day, Martha — why else do you think I came? Not that I wouldn't have come anyway, for love of you and the tadpoles—still, baking day is baking day."

"Oh, go on with you, Mr. Peter," said Martha, chuckling, her eyes behind their old-fashioned spectacles gleaming with affection.

"Martha, this is Sylvie—Kim's wife," said Peter, and the older woman peered at Sylvie with a very lively interest and curiosity.

"My sakes alive, child—I mean, you ain't nothing but a child, Miz' Kim," protested Martha. She ushered them into a kitchen that was spotlessly clean, with potted geraniums on the wide window sills, ruffled white curtains fluttering over them. There was a dignified cat asleep under the stove, which Sylvie saw was a modern oil range.

The air was spicy with the scent of the gingerbread and freshly baked rolls and crusty looking loaves of bread that lay neatly on a white cloth at an end of the big table.

Martha bustled about, getting them chairs, being sure they were placed where they would get the breeze. She produced a plate of gingerbread squares, tall glasses of cold milk, and, assured that they were supplied with all they could wish, she went on with her work, rolling out dough, cutting it, dropping the small discs into bubbling fat in a deep pot on the stove. Sylvie watched, fascinated, while the discs of dough that had been thin and uninteresting when they were dropped into the cooking fat, immediately swelled, browned and turned over, adding the scent of doughnuts to the already delectable fragrance now filling the kitchen.

Martha and Peter chatted of conditions about the place; plans for the first spring crops which were going in now; hopes for what they would plant as the summer crop; the chickens were all laying pretty well, though several of the hens were foolishly insisting on setting at a time Martha did not approve.

Sylvia felt really at home for the first time since the wave of black horror had rolled over the little Austrian village where here mother had bustled about each Friday, just as Martha was doing here; baking and preparing for the comfort of her little family, and for the refreshment of their friends who would drop in for an hour or two in the evening.

Martha said suddenly, "Mr. Peter, I want you should talk to Clara Belle. She's gettin' all knds of crazy notions in her silly head—and it would take more than just her ma to get 'em out. She likes you, though, and she'd listen to you—"

Peter asked with interest, "What in the world's the matter with Clara Belle? I always thought her a model youngster."

"Well, she's 16 now, Mr. Peter—and seems like she thinks she's a woman growed," said Martha, thumping the rolling pin a bit harder as she talked. "She wants to be a-goin' with boys. Of course that's natural — her being an awful pretty girl and all that. But this here boy she's going with—Mr. Peter, I tell you true — that boy ain't worth gully-dirt, and that's a fact."

"WHO is he, Martha?" asked Peter with interest.

"That Bill Hewes," answered Martha darkly. "His daddy come here to work as foreman at the packing plant. His ma sets around and wails that there ain't a thing to do on Halcyon, and she makes Bill take her to the mainland twicet a week so's she can go to the movies. And her with a passel of kids that look like they ain't had a filling meal nor a good suit of clothes to their backs since they was borned. And I don't want my Clara Belle taking up with no such trash."

Peter said, "But, Martha, the boy can't help it if his mother is—well, a bit of a fool, can he?"

"No, I reckon he can't — unless he takes after her," agreed Martha reluctantly. "And that's what I'm scared of."

She put down the rolling pin, turned to Peter and demanded, "Mr. Peter, d'you know what that crazy girl wants to do?"

Peter shook his head.

"She wants to take music lessons—on a fiddle! And that's an idea she got from that Hewes feller, for he's the only one on this island that's got a fiddle. He claims she's got talent."

"Well, maybe she has Martha."

"Where'd she get it from, then? Not from me nor her daddy nor none of his folks nor mine," answered Martha with spirit. "There ain't never been nobody in my family—nor Dan's neither—that could so much as lead the singing at prayer meeting, let alone play any kind of music."

"Well, sometimes people are born with a talent that didn't come from their immediate ancestors," protested Peter. "I'll have a chat with Clara Belle, and I'll see whether I think she has musical ability. If she has, we'll have to see about her having some lessons."

Martha all but glared at him, little spots of dull color high in her face.

"Well! I never thought you'd go against me, Mr. Peter," she said, obviously disappointed.

"I'm not, Martha. But after all, if Clara Belle shows any musical talent, she ought to have lessons."

"An' where'd she git 'em, I'd like to know? There ain't a fiddle teacher closter than Savannah, Mr. Peter, and you know it."

Sylvie spoke for the first time.

"Perhaps I could help your daughter, Aunt Martha," she suggested. "My father was a violinist, and he taught me. I could teach her long enough for us to decide whether or not she has any talent—if you'd like me to."

Peter and Martha stared at her, wide-eyed. Peter spoke first.

"Of course," he said quietly, "you would inherit musical ability from such a father—and we, like the dunderheads we are, never once stopped to think whether or not you could play—or sing—"

Sylvie shook her head, flushed and bright-eyed.

"I can't sing at all. Mother taught me to play the piano fairly well. My father taught me the violin. But I haven't practised in so long—" Her face darkened with memory, and Peter spoke quickly to check those tragic memories.

"Well, then, that's settled!" he said eagerly. "If you'll listen to Clara Belle play, and decide whether her talent justifies training—"

"Well, it won't, I'll tell you that now," snapped Martha. "All she does is just squeak and squawk on that old fiddle the Hewes boy's got. She can't even play a tune on it."

Peter signalled to Sylvie and they stood up to go. Martha forgot her grievance in her hospitable pleas that they stay for lunch, but Peter explained that they were expected back at the Hall.

Outside, as they walked down the garden path, they met an old man, bent and gnarled and nearly toothless, who greeted them with delight, holding up a string of fish.

"Better stay for dinner, son—you and this here pretty girl," coaxed the old man. "Soon's I scale these here and get 'em in a pan, we'll have some mighty fne eating."

"Afraid not today, Uncle Seth," said Peter gently. "Maybe next time."

The old man's face fell a little but he said quickly, "Sure, son, sure—just any time at all. We're always glad to have you."

They went on, mounted, and rode along beside the newly plowed field for a while, watching the three men who were working. Peter excused himself and rode down to talk to one of the men, while Sylvie sat Golden Boy and watched the dozen or more hens and a rooster who followed along behind one of the plow teams, busily getting their dinner from the worms turned up by the plow. She was amused to see how carefully the chickens stepped out of the way of the mules, the plow and the man—apparently without the slightest concern for their safety, yet just in the nick of time, with not a split second to waste, they stepped to safety.

CHAPTER XVII

PETER came back, apologizing for keeping her waiting. As they rode together along the lane, he said, "Well? What did you think of Square Peg Farm?"

"I loved it," answered Sylvie promptly. "But why do you call it that?"

"Because everybody on it would be a square peg in a round hole anywhere but where they are," said Peter. "Martha, for instance; she has seven children; her husband died when the twins were five months old. She had no way at all of earning a living and—well, the only hope she could see was to get the children into an orphanage and try to earn her own living. I heard about her and the children; this old place was abandoned—it's too far from Halcyon to be tended with any degree of efficiency. I asked Chloe to let me take it and see what could be done with it. I patched it up as best I could and brought Martha and the children here.

"Gradually, the others were added; Uncle Seth came next, after Martha and the children. He's a man with a swarm of children and grandchildren—all good, hard-working, honest people—but none of them wanted to be bothered with Uncle Seth and wanted to put him in a home. He'd always been an outdoor fellow—loved to hunt and fish and work out under the sky. So I brought him here. Then there were three boys, the oldest 15, the youngest one 12—who got into trouble with the police in Savannah. They were going to be sent to the reformatory. Well, I looked into the case and discovered that the main trouble seemed to be with their home environment. I talked to the judge and got them paroled in my custody and brought them here. They're going to make fine citizens some day. The man I was talking to down there—he's foreman of the place—is an ex-convict. He did five years in prison, and when he came out nobody wanted to give him a chance. He told me that at prison he had become interested in farming. He liked it; the warden encouraged him; there were books in the prison library and he studied. Well, I gave him a chance here and he's made good in a big way. All the others—there are 22 people on the place now, and in the five years we've had it in operation, nearly 40 have been here at one time or another."

"Peter, what a wonderful thing you've done!"

"Oh, I don't know about that, but I do know that it's got to keep going on—somehow," said Peter, deprecating his own share in the project, as she had known he would. "Do you understand now why I am so determined to have my share of Halcyon? The farm and enough money to keep it going?"

"Oh, Peter—yes, of course! You mustn't let anything stand in your way—no matter what!"

"I don't intend to," answered Peter in a tone that told her he was repeating to her a promise he had made often to himself.

The lane turned here into the bridle path and they rode Indian fashion so that conversation was no longer possible. But as she sent Golden Boy along at a brisk pace so that she and Peter need not be unduly late for lunch, Sylvie's mind was busy with the scenes she had witnessed that morning. It gave her a new insight into Peter's character; this friendly helping hand to the misfits and unfortunates—truly "square pegs in round holes," as he had called them.

It made her feel warm and glowing toward him; made her feel that she knew him better, that they were closer together than any of the others on Halcyon Island. And that was a good feeling, for she had felt strange and lonely among these casual, well sheltered people who could not dream what it was like to be frightened and desolate.

When they were all settled at the luncheon table, Kim addressed Sylvie.

"You're in for another new experience, Sylvie—and no farther away than tomorrow night," he told her. "The forecast is for much cooler weather, a probability of frost in low places—and that sounds an ideal time for a 'possum hunt. The Wilcoxes are giving one and we are all invited."

Sylvie looked up, bright-eyed and curious.

"A 'possum hunt? What are 'possums?"

"A small fur-bearing animal about the size of a medium-sized dog," answered Kim. "They supply fur for the collars of women's coats—and very good eating, if properly prepared."

"And they grow wild? I mean—you don't grow them for food and fur, on farms and things? You just go out in the woods and hunt them?" puzzled Sylvie.

Kim nodded. "At night, with a pack of hounds and some Negroes who seem to be able to understand 'possum talk. It's quite a sport."

Chloe added firmly, "And the name, my dear, is not 'possum at all, but 'opossum'."

"Opossum," Sylvie repeatedly obediently. "It sounds like fun."

"For everybody but the 'possum," said Peter drily, and Sylvie looked at him sharply, almost startled.

"Don't be a spoil-sport, Petey, my lad," said Kim, with a look that did not quite match the lightness of his tone. "I daresay you've been exhibiting Square Peg Farm this morning. Andy has taken her on a tour of the fisheries and the packing plant. So why not give me a chance to exhibit some of my pet forms of amusement to her?"

FOR a moment Peter and Kim looked straight at each other and there was between them the naked sword of enmity. They had never been casual and friendly, in Sylvie's presence, but they had never before seemed absolute enemies as they were now. The moment passed as Chloe said something, and the luncheon went on to its end. But Sylvie was to remember that scene again later on, under almost tragic circumstances.

She was curious and eager about the hunt. The following morning was crisp and cool and a chill, wet wind blew from the northeast. They assured her it was a "typical nor'easter" and could be counted on to blow for two or three days before the weather would clear and once more be warm and sunny.

That night, dressed as they had told her to dress, in jodhpurs, boots, a warm shirt and an extra sweater, a scarf tied about her head, she joined Peter and Kim and Judith. Andrew had begged off, on the plea that Laura wasn't feeling well and he didn't like to leave her. He and Chloe saw them off, insisting that they bring back at least one 'possum for the house servants if no more.

They crossed to the mainland in the speedboat and there a station wagon was waiting for them, driven by an hilarious couple whom Sylvie remembered having met before but whose names she could not recall. They were rapidly driven to a clearing in the woods, where the rest of the party waited, illuminated by the lights of several cars and station wagons.

A little way from the laughing group about the clearing, a dozen or more Negroes were in charge of the pack of hounds. Lean, gaunt looking dogs of a breed Sylvie had not seen before.

Each of the white people carried a powerful flashlight; some of the Negroes had flashlights and some of them carried pine-knots on the end of long sticks—the "flambeaux" beloved of the early days of hunting in the South. The night was pitch black.

The signal was given. The straining dogs were released. They ran around in circles for a moment, yapping with excitement and mad with the thrill of the hunt. The circles widened and suddenly one of the dogs stopped short and gave a bark that was different from the excited yapping; it was almost a howl, a long drawn-out sound that ended in a sharp yelp—and the dog went bounding off through the dark woods.

"Dat's old Bess—she done got a scent, white folkses—us better hurry," called the Negro who had the dogs in charge.

The other dogs, recognizing the tone of Bess' voice, had swirled away behind her.

Kim stayed close beside Sylvie, and when she stumbled over a root, it was Kim who steadied her. Kim's hand on her arm, urging her on, turning his flashlight once or twice so that he could see her face, asking anxiously, "Having fun?"

"Having grand fun—it's terribly exciting," she panted, because the pace was hard and she couldn't bear for the others to get ahead of them.

The chase led through the most dense section of the woods and into a swamp.

Presently they caught the change in the tone of the dogs' barking. "Hey—listen!" Kim cried. "The dogs have treed! Right down through here—ten to one it's in that old blackgum tree near the middle."

And now, because Kim seemed to know the way, he and Sylvie were leading. Suddenly ahead of them they saw the bright flickering of the flambeaux clustered around a tree. The dogs were milling about, their barking sharp, eager, staccato. As the white people stumbled forward, Sylvie could see in the light of the torches that the dogs were leaping about the tree as though trying to climb it, mad with excitement and the thrill of the chase that had come now to its logical ending.

The round white beam of a flashlight climbed the tree, a giant that had been blasted by lightning so that it stood leafless and stark against the sky. And high on a limb well toward the top something cowered, small and furry and huddled close to the trunk of the tree.

"There he is!" cried half a dozen voices. "Where's the axe? Come on, boys—get busy!"

Sylvie stood very still. The beam of the flashlight had dropped away. But a break in the clouds gave a glimmering of starlight, and against that faint starlit sky Sylvie could see that round furry bundle outlined starkly. She caught her breath and went rigid. That small, terrified, huddled thing—defenceless, completely at the mercy of these dogs, these dozen or more people. One small, furry shape that must be shaken by terror—did he know that he was doomed?—That he had a handful of moments to live? The sound of an axe against the base of the tree sent a sharp shudder through Sylvie's body, as though she and not that small furry thing had huddled in the tree.

She couldn't endure it—and suddenly she heard a voice she did not recognize as her own screaming wildly. "Stop it—stop it! Let him alone! He hasn't done you any harm. You've no right to kill him—just—just for fun! Stop it—do you hear? Stop it!"

The Negro, who had been about to wield the axe for a second blow, paused and turned. The others, white and black, were thunderstruck by her outburst. They stared at her, shocked by her lack of self-control quite as much as by her words.

CHAPTER XVIII

KNOWING that she was helpless to save that small furry thing, she turned and ran blindly across the swamp, the way they had come. Behind her she heard a voice calling her name—but she only ran faster, trying to find a way through the swampy black morass, stumbling now and then, picking herself up to plunge on. She had dropped her flashlight, but by now her eyes were a little more accustomed to the gloom and she made fair progress. She had left the swamp behind and found dry land, and then, just as she drew a long breath and started forward, her toe struck an exposed root and she fell heavily and lay still, too spent, too shaken to try to rise.

She was huddled there, face downward, crying, when Kim burst through the woods behind her and all but stumbled over her.

"Here she is," he called to someone else who was crashing through the woods.

Kim knelt, lifted her into a sitting position, her head against his shoulder, and asked anxiously, "Did you hurt yourself, darling? Are you all right?"

Above his head a voice demanded, "Did you find her? Is she hurt?"

Sylvie stammered, "No—I'm not hurt. I'm sorry I embarrassed you." Then her hands closed quickly on Kim's arm and she panted, "The—the opossum — did he—did they—"

"No, he got away. Nobody had any heart for sport after your little outburst," said Kim, and looked up at Peter, who stood above them. "You run along and look after Judith, Peter. I can take care of my wife."

Peter hesitated a moment, then shrugged and walked away.

Kim helped Sylvie to her feet and with an arm still about her, steadying her, he asked, "Quite sure you're all right now?"

"Oh, yes, I'm all right. I'm sorry I made a scene, Kim—but suddenly I couldn't bear it. He—he was so little and so helpless—and so friendless there among enemies. He hadn't done them any harm, and it seemed so awful for them to destroy him—just for fun! I couldn't bear it, Kim. In my heart I knew how he felt when that man started to cut the tree. I felt it—oh, Kim, I know that sounds foolish, but if you had ever been frightened and — and hunted—" Her voice died in a little sob and Kim's arm tightened about her.

After a moment he asked, "Frightened and friendless and helpless among enemies—is that the way you feel here, Sylvie?"

Sylvie caught her breath. She had not meant to reveal so much of her inner heart. She tried unsuccessfully to lie, saying breathlessly, "Oh, Kim, no—of course not!"

"But you said, 'Kim, in my heart I knew how he felt—'" he reminded her almost grimly.

She was still for just a moment and then she said, "I'm sorry, Kim. You have all been good to me. It is just that I know I have spoiled things for you, and that you are not happy."

"How have you spoiled things for me, Sylvie? I'm a little curious to follow the working of your mind, my dear."

"I know that if I had not been in your stateroom on the ship, you would have married Judith."

"My sainted aunt!" said Kim, in a tone of poorly restrained violence. "If I had wanted to marry Judith, why would I have waited until now? I've known Judith since we were kids. I'd as soon think of marrying my sister!"

Sylvie looked up at him swiftly.

"You are not just saying that to—to relieve my mind?"

"No," said Kim almost sharply. "I'm not lying—and now shall we get back to the party?"

Sylvie shrank a little from the idea and Kim said quickly. "Don't worry—there'll be no more hunting tonight! But we are supposed to meet at the clearing for supper and shenanigans."

"I suppose they are all angry with me because I spoiled their fun! But I couldn't help it—truly I couldn't!"

Kim grinned at her. "Of course you couldn't, Sylvie. I see that now and I'm sure the others will, too—eventually."

He tucked her hand through his arm and made a path with the round white beam of his flashlight to guide their feet as they returned to the clearing. The others were straggling back and they eyed Sylvie curiously. Sylvie faced them all, and to Donna Wilcox she said quietly, "I must apologize for spoiling your party, Mrs. Wilcox. I am terribly sorry—but please try to remember that it has not been so long ago that I was being hunted. It is not a pleasant experience. I seemed to sense the way the opossum felt. I couldn't keep still. I am sorry—"

"For Pete's sake, stop saying you're sorry," exclaimed Donna. "You were right—we were the ones wrong. We had no right to go out hunting the little devil, just for sport. If it's any consolation to you to know it, the chances are very good that not one of this crowd will ever hunt a 'possum again as long as we live."

Sylvie said earnestly, "For food, if one is hungry—for fur, if one needs it—such hunting I can understand—"

"Well, that's pretty noble of you," muttered somebody in the group. But Donna turned, found the speaker, glared at him sternly, and faced Sylvie again. "Well, let's skip it and have supper."

IT was very late when they returned to Halcyon island. So late—or, rather, so early in the morning—that a thin gray light of dawn lay over the gardens when they drove up to the house. But to their surprise lights blazed all over the big house, and there was a subdued bustle of activity that could be felt even before they reached the front door.

"Someone's sick," said Kim. "Perhaps Chloe—"

"It's Laura," said Judith instantly, and ran past them into the house.

They saw Andrew coming down the stairs, looking drawn and haggard. There was a look in his eyes that made them cry out in small, shocked whispers, but he came on down to meet them and Judith asked, "How is she, Andy?"

"She's going to be all right now, Dr. Jordan assures me. The baby is dead," he added quietly.

Sylvie said, "Oh, no!" and her two shaking hands were clasped hard across her mouth to check the little distressed sobbing that fought to make itself heard.

Andrew passed a hand across his forehead and said heavily, "It never really lived, Dr. Jordan says—a boy. My poor Lolly!"

His lean, pale face quivered and he fought for composure. Kim clapped a hand on his shoulder and said huskily, "Poor old Andy! Buck up, old man. You've got to help Lolly through."

Andrew nodded and managed a smile that to Sylvie was more pathetic than tears. "Sure—I know. And I've got to tell Chloe. It's going to be hard on her, too—poor old girl."

Judith asked after a moment, "Does Laura know yet?"

Andrew shook his head. "She's still under the ether."

Kim said, "And of course Chloe doesn't know, either."

Andrew's face twisted a little. "I almost think I'd rather be the one to tell Lolly than Chloe. It's going to hit her hard. The poor old girl had her heart set on a grandchild—and a boy—to carry on at Halcyon."

"I'll tell Chloe, if you'd like me to," Sylvie said quietly.

The others turned, startled, to look at her. It was as though until this moment they had forgotten that she was here. As though, in this moment of tragedy, they had withdrawn from her, excluding her from the family circle, and now they were surprised that she should assert herself as a member of that circle.

"Sure you wouldn't mind?" Andrew said gratefully.

"Of course I'd mind," said Sylvie. "Only—well, she has to know, and the sooner she knows the better. And I think maybe I could tell her as easily as any of you. So I think I'll go now and get it over with."

Kim went with her to the head of the stairs and there he laid his hand for a moment on hers. "Thanks, Sylvie—you're a trouper."

"I don't quite know what that means—but it sounds as if you liked me a little."

Kim looked down at her for a moment. And then he said firmly. "Some day, before very long, I am going to find an opportunity to tell you just how much I really do like you, Sylvie—you're a sport."

"Even if I did spoil your hunting?" asked Sylvie.

Before he could answer her she had walked across the wide hall to the door of Chloe's room. Without knocking she opened the door and walked into the room.

Chloe lay propped up against many pillows. In her soft, woolly night dress, the old-fashioned nightcap that tied beneath her chin, she looked very old and very little. But her black eyes were anxious and sharp. As Sylvie came closer to the bed, Chloe demanded fretfully, "Well? Don't just stand there—how is she? Is it over?"

Sylvie said gently, "Laura is going to be all right. You mustn't worry about her."

Chloe made a little gesture of impatience. "Don't talk nonsense. Why shouldn't I worry about her? I'm very fond of Laura."

"She's sleeping now and the doctor says she's going to be all right," said Sylvie.

Chloe lay very still for a moment and then she asked fearfully, "And my great-grandchild? Is it a boy?"

"It was a boy, Chloe—but it never really lived."

Chloe looked as though some terrific force had struck her to utter dumbness. She lay so still, so rigid, that Sylvie knelt swiftly beside the bed and put her strong young arms about that frail old figure that seemed to shrink, to age there within her arms.

And after a long, long moment Chloe said very faintly, "My poor, poor Lolly! The poor, dear child."

She pushed Sylvie aside and sat straighter in bed. "I must go to her," she said.

Sylvie pushed her back against her pillows. "No, no, Chloe—you mustn't. She's asleep now. You must sleep, too, so that when she wakes up you will be strong to help her. You need sleep."

"I'd like to see Andrew. Ask him to come up, Sylvie. And then leave us alone for a little while."

"Of course, darling," said Sylvie, bending to kiss the soft, wrinkled old cheek.

As she came down the stairs Andrew met her at the foot, the others grouped at the door of the living-room.

"Is she all right?" asked Andrew. "Chloe, I mean."

"Yes, of course," said Sylvie, and managed a faint smile. "She wants to see you, Andy—alone."

Andrew nodded. "Thanks, Sylvie—you're a swell youngster."

He went swiftly up the stairs and out of sight.

Sylvie, looking tired and a little dishevelled, with smudges of weariness beneath her eyes, hesitated at the foot of the stairs, facing Judith and Kim. Judith stared at her with cold, unfriendly eyes; and there was a look in Kim's eyes that Sylvie could not quite understand.

She had a little feeling of confusion, of uneasiness, as she stood there. Suddenly, flushed and shy, she said, "I think I'll go and change—I'm terribly untidy."

"And get some sleep, Sylvie," Peter said.

"Sleep? But it's daylight," protested Sylvie.

Judith's mouth was a thin, twisted line and her voice tinkled a little with ice as she drawled, "I think we'll be able to carry on without you, for an hour or so anyway! After all, there's a nurse in Laura's room; the doctor will be back in a couple of hours and there are servants besides."

Kim looked at Judith as though he had never seen her before and didn't like her very much now that he had. But Sylvie did not wait for him to speak. She turned swiftly, stinging a little with the ugliness in Judith's tone, and went up the stairs to her own room.

She closed her door behind her and stood very still for a moment.

CHAPTER XIX

KIM had been very sweet to her, she told herself; and remembered again the moment when he had knelt beside her and gathered her into his arms and held her close, comforting her. There had been a lovely something about that moment, a breathless feeling that being there in his arms was the most wonderful thing in her life, the most right thing in the world. As though she belonged there! Only, of course, that was crazy. Kim wasn't in love with her—oh, he'd called her "darling," and he'd even kissed her lightly. But that meant nothing. She had learned long ago that in Kim's crowd such endearments as "darling" and "dearest" flew like the wind, and meant as much: that a kiss was as casual as a handshake.

But she could always remember that Kim had held her close; that he had comforted her and called her "darling," and that he had kissed her. And some day, when the six-months' period Chloe had asked had expired, and she had found her mother's family and she was many miles away from Halcyon, she could remember those things. They would be like priceless jewels she could take out of her memory and hold close in her empty hands.

Judith had all but insisted that she go to bed. Yet she had never felt so wide awake in all her life. She donned a crisp morning dress of pale yellow linen, tied a matching ribbon through her curls, and went quietly down the stairs, in search of breakfast. There might be something she could do—and she wanted terribly to do anything that was possible to help these people whom she loved. They were the family she had longed for. She didn't dare think how wonderful it would be if only she had the right to make her home here for always. The island was like an earthly paradise. Already she loved it as though she had been born and brought up here.

She went to the dining-room and Kim and Andrew looked up from their coffee to greet her with an eager welcome that warmed the cockles of her heart.

"Sit here," said Kim, drawing back Chloe's chair.

Sylvie's eyes widened and she stepped back.

"Oh, no! I wouldn't think of it," she protested, taking her usual chair.

Kim grinned a little. "Afraid of Chloe? She's not coming down to breakfast. I only wanted you to sit where you could manage the coffee tray easily."

"I'd feel too presumptuous for words sitting in Chloe's chair," said Sylvie, as the old butler moved the heavy silver coffee service to her place and went out to get her fruit and toast.

"When I first came here," admitted Sylvie, "I thought it was terrible to call her Chloe. It sounded disrespectful. I felt we should say grandmother, but after I'd been here a little while and knew her better, I saw that you couldn't possibly call her anything but Chloe. I wonder why?"

"Because Chloe is the youngest thing on the island," answered Andrew. "The spirit of her is youth. She's valiant and indomitable and gay. There isn't anyone else in all the world like her."

"No," said Sylvie huskily, "no one."

Kim looked down at Sylvie curiously.

"You're not afraid of her?" he asked lightly.

"Afraid of her? But how could I be?" she protested.

"She's very frank and outspoken and she can be a terror when she is aroused," said Kim. "Lots of people are afraid of her."

"People who do not know her, perhaps," Sylvie agreed, buttering a bit of toast. "But no one who has been under the same roof with her for as much as a week could really be afraid of her. She's too fine and brave, and—well, she's Chloe."

"Right!" said Andrew firmly. "She's Chloe. And when you've said that, you've said it all."

He pushed back his chair and stood up.

"I'll take over at the plant, Andy. You stick around here. Laura will be wanting you," said Kim. Andrew nodded gratefully, and went out of the room.

"More coffee?" Sylvie asked Kim, holding out her hand for his cup.

Kim, instead of giving her the cup, caught her hand and looked at it curiously. She still wore the heavy seal ring that, in lieu of anything more conventional, he had placed on her finger when they were married on the boat. She had wound a bit of narrow ribbon about the inside loop of the ring, so that it would not slip off.

Kim said, "That's not much of a wedding ring."

"I like it," replied Sylvie evenly. "And it will do quite nicely for the length of time that still remains."

Kim looked up at her, frowning a little.

"Meaning what?" he asked shortly.

"Meaning that Chloe asked me to stay six months—and that was a good while ago," said Sylvie. "When the time is up, I will give you back your ring—and walk out of your life. And you can just forget that there was an interlude named Sylvie Landau."

Kim released her hand and she tucked it with the other one in her lap so that he would not see it shake. It was silly to sit here trembling while Kim studied her curiously, almost as though he had never seen her before.

"And that's the way you want it?" he said at last.

Sylvie's heart stuck in her throat, but after a moment she was able to say, "Of course—what else could we do?"

Kim shoved back his chair and stood up.

"Of course—what else could we do?" he echoed, and went swiftly out of the house.

She heard the roar of the station wagon's motor as he went racing down the drive a few miuntes later. She sat very still for a while, her face hidden behind her shaking hands, her heart thudding so loudly that she felt sure they could hear it in the kitchen. Her breath came as though she had been running very hard—and that was crazy, too. But then so many of her emotions these days were crazy—she couldn't even begin to understand herself. There seemed small need in trying.

IN the late afternoon, a small group gathered in the grassy plot at the foot of the tall row of yew trees that was, among the Negroes, called the Ghost Walk. Here was the "family buryin' ground" that was an essential part of all old plantations. And here the tiny son of Andrew and Laura was buried among his ancestors. Andrew carried the tiny casket down from the house in his arms as he would never carry his laughing, crowing, living little boy. Chloe had insisted on coming, too, and she walked leaning heavily on Kim's arm, looking small and frail and heartbreakingly sad. For once, the unspoken feud between them was ended, so that Sylvie and Judith could walk side by side like friends, their arms burdened with spring blossoms from the garden. Behind them a little cluster of servants, with old Lucinda, her eyes red with weeping, leading them.

The little cemetery was beautiful in the last rays of the setting sun. The old live-oaks that ringed it about seemed to bend low, in loving benediction above the tiny life that had never been; the azaleas that glowed like soft flames above the ancient stones rustled with a soft wind that was like a sigh.

But Sylvie could not keep back the tears as Chloe said, in her frail, beautiful old voice, "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven."

And Andrew said, so softly that they could scarcely catch the words, "Goodby, little son."

Lucindy sobbed loudly and Chloe's shaking hands hid her white face as Kim and Sylvie turned her about and led her back to the house. She let them put her straight to bed when she reached the house. She ate a few bites of the bread and milk that Sylvie brought her, and which she insisted was the only supper she wanted. And then she asked to be left alone.

Sylvie went back downstairs but dinner was a quiet, almost a silent, meal. Judith tried to start conversation but no one seemed to want to talk. When the meal was over Andrew excused himself and went up to Laura.

Judith said impatiently, "Oh, for heaven's sake, let's snap out of the glooms. We all feel badly about it—but sitting around glooming won't help. Shall we have a rubber of bridge?"

"Why not?" Kim agreed.

But they were all glad when the game could be ended and they could say good-night.

For a few days the spirit of gloom lay heavily over the Hall. But gradually Chloe regained her strength and could be up and about; and Laura grew stronger.

Sylvie never forgot the moment when Chloe and Laura saw each other for the first time after the baby's death. Laura lay scarcely less white than her pillows, with a lifeless, dull look about her that twisted Sylvie's heart.

Laura spoke just once to Sylvie about the baby's loss. She had not wept when they told her; she had not shed a tear since; she had only gone on lying very still, saying nothing, her eyes fixed on space.

But the first day that Chloe was up and about, she had come into Laura's room and stood for a moment beside the bed, leaning heavily on her stick, looking down at Laura with a passion of tenderness in her crumpled old face.

"My poor Lolly!" she said.

Laura's face twisted almost with pain and she said curtly, "Skip it, Chloe. You and I don't like each other, so let's not step out of character. You just tolerated me as a wife for Andy because you thought he and I could have fine sons to carry on your island—"

"Don't, my dear," Chloe said, her voice aching with pity, "please don't! I've always been fond of you, Laura—but you didn't want my affection, and so I tried not to let you see it."

Laura stared at her, startled out of her bitterness.

"You've liked me, Chloe? I don't believe it!"

Chloe smiled very faintly, a smile of pain and heartache touched with courage and strength. "Then that's my fault, my dear," she said. "I did a better job than I thought of keeping my affection to myself. I loved you first of all because Andy did. You made him happy, and for that I was grateful. But later I grew to love you for yourself—because you are beautiful, you are gay, you have strength of character."

CHAPTER XX

THEY were all together the first night that Laura had been allowed downstairs to dinner. All save Peter, who had flown to New York a few days before on business.

It had been a pleasant meal. Gay, even, because they were all so glad to have Laura back with them again, and because Chloe seemed herself again. They had finshed dinner and were in the living-room when they heard the sound of a car in the drive and heard Peter greeting the old butler.

"There's Peter!" cried Sylvie, half out of her chair before he reached the door.

She did not catch the look that sped between Judith and Kim, nor the look that Chloe gave the three of them. She almost ran to the living-room door to greet Peter, whose face lit up with delight at sight of her.

He greeted the others more casually and produced a package which he laid in Sylvie's arms. It was a violin case, and Sylvie caught her breath at the sight of it.

"I found it in a little shop on the East Side, Sylvie," he told her eagerly, as though forgetful of the others, who were looking on curiously. "I hope I got you something really good—but I'm a dud at these things. The man who kept the shop swore that this was a really fine instrument and that anybody who knew anything about violins would be glad to have it."

Sylvie's hands were shaking a little as she lifted the lid and her eyes fell upon the rich, wine-colored wood of the instrument within. She touched it almost reverently. Peter held the case and Sylvie lifted the violin out, her hands "knowing" it instantly as something really good.

"Oh, Peter!" she whispered, and could say no more.

"But why should you give Sylvie a violin, Peter?" Kim asked sharply.

"Well, chiefly because Sylvie inherits some of her father's musical ability—and his violin was lost when the invaders took over her home town."

The others stared at Sylvie and Kim said, "I didn't know you played, Sylvie."

Sylvie was too interested in the violin to be more than partly conscious of the scene. She did not even catch the odd tone in Peter's voice when he answered for her, "I'm afraid there are quite a few things about Sylvie that none of us know—not because Sylvie is secretive, but because she is a shy soul and modest, and none of us has taken the trouble to ask her about herself. I found out quite by accident that she was a pupil of her father's—something any of us should have guessed. Her mother was a pianist and teacher of music in a New England school, her father a concert violinist—yet not one of us has asked Sylvie to play a tune on the piano."

Kim and Peter stared at each other and for an instant the others in the room were silent, startled by what they saw in the two faces.

"It seems to me," said Kim distinctly, "that you are taking quite a lot of interest in Sylvie—all of a sudden."

"It's about time somebody did, don't you think?" answered Peter in a tone that matched Kim's. "And what's so sudden about it?"

Chloe said hurriedly, "Sylvie dear, won't you play something for us?"

Sylvia turned a glowing face upon her and said, "I'd love to—only it's been so long since I practised—"

"You're not going coy on us, angel, and make us coax you?" cried Laura.

Sylvie laughed. "No of course not. I'd love to play—I couldn't keep from it, I'm afraid—only you'll have to make allowances."

She touched the strings, tuned them with a deftness and an intentness that spoke of her deep and almost reverent love. Then she drew the bow across the strings and looked at Peter with shining eyes.

"Oh, Peter, it's much finer than my father's. It must have cost a fortune!" she stammered.

"I got it in a second-hand shop, child—for a song!" declared Peter, looking Kim in the eye and daring him to say anything.

Sylvie said, "This was a song my father wrote. I always loved it."

And she began to play. It was a gay little tune with no pretensions to greatness. In it there was the very essence of spring — bird-song, rippling brooks, meadows green and white beneath a warm sun set in a blue sky, apple blossoms tossing against that cloudless sky, the happy laughter of children playing. When she had finished Chloe said:

"That's charming! Sylvie, how beautifully you play!"

Sylvie played again and again. Songs her mother had loved; bits of classics her father had felt she must be able to play perfectly. She played until the walls of this handsomely proportioned room seemed to fade away; until these people who had taken her in, even though she was a stranger, faded. In their stead she saw the warm, bright room in the little house in the Austrian Tyrol; her father listening intently as she played, her mother at the piano—the small, shabby room warm and gay with love and tenderness and happiness . . . .

On a sudden discordant note the music died and she looked swiftly about her; memory bringing her back—and suddenly she caught her breath on a little sob and ran out of the room, leaving the others to stare wonderingly at each other.

"Poor little thing!" Chloe said softly. "She's been very brave and very gallant. But there are moments when I know she is grieving for all that she has lost, and for those of her friends who were left behind."

IN the morning Sylvie greeted them all with her usual composure. They carefully did not notice that her eyes were a little pink, as though she had allowed herself the luxury of crying herself to sleep the night before. She came down with the precious violin tucked beneath her arm and she put it down very tenderly before she came to the breakfast table.

She was in her riding clothes and she apologized to Chloe, explaining eagerly, "I thought since it's a Saturday morning, it might be a good chance for me to hear Clara Belle play." She turned to Peter. "I'll ride over with you if you like, Peter."

"What's all this?" Kim said sharply. "Clara Belle?"

Sylvie turned to him eagerly. "Yes, Martha's daughter, you know. Martha's upset because Clara Belle has musical ambitions—Martha seems a little suspicious of ambitious people—and so I offered to hear Clara Belle play. If Peter and I think she's got talent—well, I thought I could give her some lessons."

"Oh, so that's what's up," said Kim.

Sylvie turned swiftly to Chloe, flushed and eager. "I thought last night after I'd gone to bed—maybe the school here, where the children on the island go, could use a music teacher—that is, if they haven't already got one. I could give lessons to the classes. I'm good enough as a musician for that. I gave some lessons at home, when my father was busy—"

Her voice died beneath the startled glances of the others. And before Chloe could speak, Judith drawled, her voice edged with malice, "You talk as though you expected to spend the rest of your life on the island, Sylvie. What ever became of the idea that you and Kim were to divorce, once you had your first citizenship papers?"

There was a moment of dead silence about the table, and then Sylvie said, "I'm sorry. It was stupid of me, of course. Please forgive me. I don't—seem to care for any breakfast—"

"Come back here, child, and finish your breakfast!" Chloe said swiftly. "Don't pay any attention to Judith. She's a spiteful, jealous cat. I think it would be very nice for you to have a class of music students at the school—the teacher will be delighted. And, Judith, if you've finished, I wish you'd have the maids get at the mending. The linen closet is beginning to look very untidy."

Judith got up, her eyes blazing. But she had a healthy respect for Chloe's tongue and seldom flouted her authority. She went out of the room, walking very straight and tall, and looking like a gloriously lovely storm cloud. After she had gone, Chloe said, "I declare, I don't know what's got into Judith. She wears a double barb on her tongue these days—"

Peter, with a swift glance at Sylvie, who was fighting not to reveal the hurt Judith's words had been, said to Chloe, "The barbed tongue, angel face, is nothing new for Judith! Don't you remember—Kim and I used to pull her hair and rub her lovely nose in the mud for the mean things she used to say when we were children. She just can't abide competition, that's Judith's main trouble."

He looked down at Sylvie and his voice was very gentle. "Drink the last of that coffee, youngster, and come along. I'm on tenterhooks to know whether Clara Belle has something—besides the affection of the Hewes boy."

CHAPTER XXI

KIM said nothing. Afterward, Sylvie was to remember that he had not once spoken, after Judith had made her little cutting remark. The realization of Kim's silence, and the inescapable meaning of it, seemed to draw a filmy cloud over the loveliness of the day as she rode ahead of Peter down the trail, the violin tucked under her arm.

By the time they had reached Square Peg Farm, however, she had herself well in hand. She and Peter were greeted warmly by Martha and with an almost breathless eagerness by Clara Belle, a pretty dark-haired girl whose eyes went to the violin beneath Sylvie's arm with an almost avid eagerness.

"I tell you, Miz' Kim," protested Martha in sharp scorn, "you're just a-wastin' your time on her. Where'd she inherit any musical talent, I'd like to know? Ain't never been anybody in my family could carry a tune in a gallon bucket—nor on her pa's side, either."

"Well, we'll soon see, Martha," Peter told her. "Sylvie's father was a concert violinist, her mother taught piano in a girls' college, and Sylvie has taught music to some of her father's pupils. So whatever she says about Clara Belle's talent, you can depend on."

Sylvie turned impulsively to Clara Belle.

"You're not going to mind if I tell you the truth, Clara Belle? I mean—if I don't think you have talent, you won't mind if I say so frankly?"

"I want you should tell me the truth. That's all I ask you," said Clara Belle, reaching for the violin.

The way she tucked it beneath her chin, the way her hands caressed the bow, told Sylvie even before the girl began to play that Clara Belle had a genuine feeling for music.

The melody she played was a simple, inconsequential thing, obviously something the Hewes boy had taught her. But there was a sureness in the way the girl handled the instrument that told Sylvie here was someone worth training.

She nodded when Clara Belle handed back the violin. "I can give you two lessons a week, Clara Belle," she said quietly. "That, with all the practising you will have to do, will be as much as you'll have time for."

The girl was still for a moment, and then her face seemed to flame into life and a beauty that had not been there before.

"You mean, Miz' Kim, that—that I have got a smidgin of talent? Maybe some day I can play real music?"

"I believe you can be a real musician, Clara Belle—if you'll work very hard and practise a lot," said Sylvie quite honestly. "Maybe you won't have a lot of time to play and have fun like others your age—music's a hard taskmaster, you know."

"I won't mind working hard if I've got something to look forward to," said Clara Belle, her face radiant. "I don't care anything about dates with boys and foolishness like that, if I can be working for something I want like I want to be a great fiddle player, some day."

Martha sat down heavily in her chair and looked at her daughter with respect.

"Sakes alive!" she murmured half aloud. "Think of me having a young un that can play real music!"

Peter said, his eyes twinkling just a little, "Remember that package I brought over last night and asked you to keep for me, Martha?"

"I—yes, I reckon I do," answered Martha a trifle dazedly.

"Well, give it to Clara Belle. It's something I bought for her in New York. She'll be needing it to practise on," said Peter, and left Clara Belle and her mother ecstatically vocal over the violin that he had brought for Clara Belle, so sure had he been that she would prove to have a talent worthy of training.

When he and Sylvie were back on the trail, Sylvie said, "That was fine of you, Peter—to be so sure of her talent—"

"I wasn't so sure of her talent," answered Peter, quite honestly. "But I knew Martha was worried about the youngster's growing awareness of boys and all that. I thought the fiddle would keep her mind occupied until it grew up enough to be able to judge her boy friends a little more accurately."

Sylvie reined in her horse where the trail narrowed so that from here on they would have to ride single file. Peter looked at her as though he would be quite content to go on doing that for the rest of his life. And she was well worth the look in his eyes. She was hatless, a ribbon threaded through her curls in lieu of a hat. Her beige-colored whipcord jodhpurs fitted her slim legs smoothly; her pongee shirt was open at the throat; her lightweight sweater was yellow, as was the ribbon through her hair. Her face had filled out a little and taken on a delicate tan that was tremendously becoming.

She sat very still, unconscious of his eyes upon her, and he knew that she was thinking something out before she spoke. When she looked up at him, she asked quietly, "Peter, do you think that I could earn my living as a music teacher?"

Peter's eyes widened a little.

"Well, for heaven's sake—why try?" he exploded. "If you want to earn a living, Sylvie—you're young, beautiful and a really fine musician—you could get all sorts of work. Night clubs, perhaps with an orchestra. There are several all-girl orchestras, and even picture work—" He broke off and when he spoke again his tone was different. "But you're 'Miz' Kim' Sylvie. Why should you want to earn your own living?"

His tone was faintly dry, a little cynical, but Sylvie was too engrossed in her thoughts to be aware of that.

"But I shan't go on being 'Miz' Kim' much longer, Peter," she told him. "Chloe asked me to stay six months. The time will be up soon, and I will have to earn my own living."

"Kim will want to make you an allowance—" Peter pointed out.

She shook her head, unwilling to let him finish.

"I couldn't, Peter. I just couldn't. He's already done so much for me—all of you have. I can't ever pay my debt of gratitude to you all—" Her voice caught and she was still lest tears overcome her.

Peter was silent for a long moment, and then he said very quietly, "Chloe is willing to consent to an annulment if you and Kim haven't made a go of it at the end of six months?"

Sylvie nodded. "She is so sure—but, of course, from the very first I knew it couldn't ever be."

"You are fond of the island, Sylvie?"

She lifted her face and looked at the arching blue sky; the woods that were green and filled with blossoming and the mad rapture of the birds. "I have been happier here than anywhere in my life," she confessed. "I wish I never had to go away."

"Then don't, Sylvie—don't ever leave!" said Peter. Sylvie looked at him swiftly, caught by the agitated tone of his voice. "I mean it, Sylvie. Stay here, with me. Because, Sylvie, I love you very much," he finished.

"Oh, no, Peter—you mustn't—"

"But I do. Why mustn't I, Sylvie?"

Her eyes filled with tears and her soft mouth trembled a little as she said, "Because, Peter, you are my friend and I owe you so much—and I am so fond of you—that I can't bear to hurt you."

Peter straightened and the line about his mouth etched itself a little more deeply as he nodded and said, "And all that boils down to the simple truth that you don't love me."

"I am terribly sorry, Peter. You are fine and good and honest. I admire you so much, and respect you a lot. You are my dearest friend. I like you more than anyone I have ever known!"

"But you don't love me." Peter stated it with a grim finality that brushed aside her attempts to soften the blow.

"I am so sorry, Peter—"

"Well, don't be!" said Peter almost roughly. "After all, there's nothing for you to be sorry for. I've a lot to be grateful for just in having known you—and having had the privilege of loving you."

"But, Peter—"

He turned on her almost violently. "If you offer to be a sister to me, Sylvie, I'll smack you, so help me!"

She caught her breath on a little laugh that tried valiantly to belie the tears in her eyes, and put out a hand to touch him comfortingly. But Peter could not quite take that—not just yet. He drew back sharply and said, "Well, shall we trot along? It must be getting on toward lunch time."

Without waiting for her to answer, he leaned over, flicked Golden Boy with the end of his crop, and that indignant animal jerked about and started toward home at a brisk pace.

Sylvie looked back at Peter, but there was no further chance for conversation. And she sensed that he did not want to talk any more. She was sick with regret that she'd had to hurt him. It had not been her fault, of course; still, if she had been a sane and sensible creature, she would have given her unruly heart to Peter who wanted it and would have cherished it as long as they two should live; instead of to Kim, who did not want it and so would have found it an embarrassing gift, if he had known that it was his. Which, fortunately for Sylvie's pride, he did not and which he must not ever know.

She admitted it now, as she rode ahead of Peter down the green trail that lay inches deep in fallen brown pine needles. Admitted that she loved Kim. She had thought when she first come to Halcyon Island, when Kim had been so frankly displeased with her, that she had stopped loving him. She had been hurt that he had not wanted her there. She had resented his attitude and everything about him and had told herself that the emotion she had felt for him on the boat had been only gratitude and a passionate relief at being rescued.

Just when she had stopped being hurt because of his indifference, she could not be sure; just at what moment she had turned over to him her heart and her hopes and all her dreams for the future, she did not know. She knew only that when Peter had said, "I love you very much," she would have given the very heart out of her body if it had been Kim.

She was a little appalled to realize how very much she wanted Kim's love; because, of course, she hadn't a chance in the world of ever having it. Kim was in love with Judith—oh, he denied it and maybe he really believed that he wasn't; but this morning when Judith had made that cutting remark and Chloe had rebuked her so sharply, Sylvie had seen the look in Kim's eyes. He had been furiously angry with Chloe for scolding Judith, and he would not have taken the incident so seriously if he had not been in love with Judith. Maybe the knowledge had struck him just then—with the sudden, almost devastating force with which Sylvie had discovered that she loved Kim. That would explain the stricken look that had sped over Kim's face at Chloe's rebuke of Judith.

Oh, things were all a mess, Sylvie told herself. She loved Kim; Kim loved Judith; Peter loved Sylvie; and Judith loved Kim. She, Sylvie, was in the very centre, making everybody miserable; keeping Judith and Kim apart; making Peter unhappy; and being herself thoroughly miserable.

If only she could adjust things! She could for Judith and Kim, she reminded herself, and went a little white at the thought; she could, and she would, just as soon as she had stayed at Halcyon long enough to keep her promise to Chloe! With that thought, she gave Golden Boy his head so that he could break into a brisk run, with Peter pounding along behind her too far away for conversation.

CHAPTER XXII

THEY had finished dinner that evening and were in the drawing-room having coffee. Chloe, a small figure in delicate lavender silk so stiff that it all but stood alone, sat behind the coffee service, her small feet in lavender slippers resting comfortably on a footstool.

She looked about the room, taking them all in. Laura sat in a deeply cushioned chair, Andrew close beside her, his hand unobtrusively holding hers; Peter in a corner with a book, not one page of which, as Chloe knew, he had turned in the past half hour; Judith sat beneath a shaded lamp knitting a sweater for herself; Sylvie, curled up on the jade-green satin sofa, was intent on a book of operas she had found in the bookcase a day or two before; Kim staring into space.

Chloe nodded her white head with a little contented movement and rang for the butler to remove the coffee service. When he had done this, he came back almost immediately, carrying a large black dispatch box which he placed on the coffee table.

"That will do, thank you," said Chloe. "Close the doors as you go out."

The butler went out silently, closed the doors, and Chloe looked from one to the other of those in the room with her.

"What's all this, Chloe? You're being darned mysterious, all of a sudden," accused Andrew, smiling a little.

But Chloe did not smile in answer, and he saw, suddenly alarmed, that her veined old hand shook a little as she laid it on the box.

"Please come closer, all of you," she exclaimed, waving them to chairs and footstools closer to her own chair. "I've been doing a lot of thinking these last few days—and I've come to the conclusion that I am a mean, spiteful, cantankerous old woman—"

"Chloe!" cried Kim. "How dare you say such things about our favorite grandmother?"

"It's downright shocking, Chloe," protested Andrew.

But Chloe's hand went up to silence them. "I'm not fishing for compliments, or demanding assurances of your loyalty," she told them. "As though, after twisting all your lives into a pattern that I wanted you to follow, and seeing you obey me, I could need further proof of your loyalty. As though your staying on here day after day, and letting me play hob with your lives, I didn't have the most perfect example of loyalty—"

She looked swiftly from one to the other of them, and burst out accusingly, "You must have known that will could be broken. My husband had no right to make such a will. He did it for me. He knew what a silly, feckless creature I am, and that, if I were left alone, the place would go to rack and ruin. Well, you should have let it. Aren't people's lives far more important than a plantation like Halcyon? You shouldn't have stayed. You should have flouted me!"

Judith said coolly, "After all, there is all that money, you know."

"Shut up, Judith!" cried Kim. "Do you hear?"

Judith gave him a sultry glance, but was silent.

"Yes, there is all that money, Judith," Chloe went on. "And I have sat here holding it in my clutches, and forcing you all to my will, simply by the power of the purse. That is a wrong and wicked thing—"

"It's nothing of the kind," exclaimed Kim. "The money was grandfather's, and he left it to you to do with as you pleased."

Chloe nodded. "He thought it would guarantee me that you would all stay here, keep things going—that I need not be alone, that Halcyon would go on. Still, it was not right that I should have forced you to stay against your will. Please, Kim darling—all of you. I'm a little tired. It takes a lot of saying. Let me go on, please."

Sylvie was appalled at the look that sped between Kim and Judith. It was a look almost of hatred. These two people who loved each other had been kept apart, their love thwarted until it had turned to hatred. A terrible thing had been done—but it had been she, Sylvie, who had done it, not Chloe. She had thrust herself into the lives of these two people—oh, she hadn't meant to do that, of course. But how much misery and tragedy had been bred in the world by people who had not meant to do wicked and unkind things!

Chloe said gently, "You, Andrew, my dear, and Laura—I've kept you here running things for me, when you might have had a great career outside the narrow confines of this island. You are a brilliant attorney, Andrew; I know something of the opportunities that you've had and refused, for my sake."

"It was no sacrifice, Chloe," said Andrew swiftly.

Chloe smiled at him, though there was the glimmer of tears in her eyes. "Bless you, my dear, for that," she said simply. "But it is a sacrifice that need no longer continue. I am dividing the estate now, instead of forcing you all to wait until my death."

THERE was a stunned silence. Andrew and Laura looked at each other, startled. There was a momentary flash of delight in Laura's face and her hand curled warmly in Andrew's, that held it tightly.

Chloe went on quietly, "There are certain bequests to the servants—Lucindy, for one, is to have her cottage, a bit of land and an income that will keep her in comfort the rest of her days and then go on to her children. There are other, smaller legacies. These are to be paid out of the estate, with Andrew and Kim and Peter as executors, after my death."

"Don't keep saying that, Chloe," Kim exclaimed. "It's hard to listen to."

Chloe looked straight at him and answered soberly, "It shouldn't be, Kim. I've lived a full life, a glorious life. But now I'm a little tired. I shall welcome a long rest. There are many compensations. Death is not to be feared or fought off. It can be a good friend, coming as a blessed relief—"

"Chloe!" cried Laura in quick protest.

"I'm sorry, dear. I'm a blundering, tactless old woman."

"You are not old, Chloe," Sylvie protested. "You are the youngest, loveliest person that ever lived. And you couldn't blunder or be tactless—not if you tried to learn for a hundred years."

"I am, at least, a very fortunate woman to be surrounded by so much love and tenderness," said Chloe. "But to go on—there are certain bequests that I wish to be attended to. And there are two trust funds that I have already taken steps to establish. One is for Judith, who has been my good and faithful and devoted—"

"Servant!" Judith supplied the word in a tone that cut.

Chloe stiffened a little and looked straight at the girl. "Have you felt that, Judith? I am sorry—terribly sorry. I have looked upon you with affection almost as my daughter—"

"Almost is quite the word, I think," said Judith.

The others were shocked by the venom in Judith's tone. None of them spoke, so bewildered were they at the unexpectedness of her attack.

"If you felt that there was a lack of affection toward you, Judith, I am afraid it was your own fault," said Chloe stiffly. "I have been fond of you. I have tried to do everything I could to make you happy—to, so far as it was possible, take the place of your mother. But, Judith, to receive love, one must give love. I'm afraid you've never learned that."

Judith was silent and Chloe cleared her throat and went on, "There is to be a trust fund for Judith, that will give her an adequate income for life, and that she may leave to her children or other heirs if she wishes. There is to be another trust fund for the same amount for Sylvie."

Sylvie, startled, said swiftly, "Oh, no—you mustn't. I couldn't possibly accept it."

"Why couldn't you, Sylvie?" asked Chloe.

"Because I have no right. You have all been so kind to me. You've put me so deeply in your debt that I couldn't possibly accept anything more. Peter has pointed out that I can easily earn my own living, and I want to do that."

She looked swiftly about the little group and went on impulsively, "You can never know, any of you, what it has meant to me to be accepted here as a member of your family, to have the same privileges and the same position that you have—"

"But why shouldn't you have those privileges, Sylvie? After all, you're Kim's wife," Laura pointed out.

"And that," said Chloe, before Sylvie could answer, "brings us to another point. Which is: Not one of you need spend a moment more on Halcyon than you wish. Andrew, you and Laura are free to take your inheritance and go tomorrow if you like. The balance of the estate, after the two trust funds have been set up, sufficient money put aside to provide the legacies and bequests, is to be divided equally betwen Kim, Andrew and Peter."

"That's not quite fair, Chloe," said Peter. "Andrew and Kim are your grandsons. I'm only a great-nephew. My share should be considerably smaller than theirs. If I could have Square Peg Farm and a fund sufficient to keep it going—"

"Don't be a sap!" exclaimed Kim. "Chloe said the three of us share equally—and that's the way it's going to be."

"Of course, Pete," said Andrew. "After all, you do more good with Square Peg Farm than Kim and I with the whole bloomin' island."

"I never heard such drivelling idiocy in my life," said Judith insolently, getting to her feet. "You are all just a little too noble for me. I'm afraid I can't quite endure any more. I'm going upstairs to pack! I, for one, accept with all sorts of delight, Chloe, any plans you may have made for me, including the trust fund. I, at least, am honest enough to admit that I appreciate your generosity no end, and that I can't wait to see the last of this dull hole!"

CHAPTER XXIII

SHE walked out and closed the door behind her. There was a brief silence in the room. Chloe broke it, saying quietly, "Judith is perfectly right to be honest and express her feelings quite frankly. I hope the rest of you will follow her example."

She turned to Sylvie and said, "My dear, you may leave the island any time you like. I will arrange the annulment of your marriage so that it will not jeopardize your citizenship. You need have no fear of that. With a trust fund that will guarantee you will never become a charge on the country, and with the fact that you are half an American anyway, I don't think a good firm of Washington attorneys will have much difficulty getting your papers through for you."

"I don't know how to thank you—"

"Don't try. You owe me no thanks," said Chloe briskly. "And now that everything is quite clear, I think I'll go to bed."

"Let me help you, Chloe," said Laura, and there was genuine affection in her voice.

"Thank you, my dear." Chloe got to her feet, leaning heavily on her stick, and they saw that she seemed shrunken and older, as though the effort of talking had weakened her a lot.

To the others she said quietly, "We can discuss any further details later, Andrew, will you draw up all the necessary papers? You and Kim and Peter can talk them over and, I'm sure, agree on all the details. Then you can make a little cross-mark and I'll sign the papers there. Good-night."

She went out and the door closed behind her. They heard Laura's voice as the two women went slowly up the stairs that were growing more difficult for Chloe, without their realizing it until now.

"She should have a bedroom downstairs," said Andrew, and the others nodded.

They would not admit, in words spoken aloud, that Chloe had failed in health; that she seemed less strong, less valiant, less sure of herself. But in the heart of each there was a little creeping fear, a cold finger of premonition; for they all loved her dearly, Sylvie scarcely less than the men who had known her all their lives and grown up under her roof.

When the sound of Chloe's and Laura's footsteps had died away, Sylvie said, "I—I think I'll go to bed, too. If—if you don't mind—"

Peter and Kim both moved to open the door for her, but Peter reached it first. Sylvie did not see the look that leaped into Kim's face — though Andrew did, and his eyes widened a little. Then he grinned and began thoughtfully to fill his pipe.

Sylvie went up to her room and made ready for bed. But she had never been farther from sleep in her life. Suddenly, she could not endure the inaction any longer. She slipped into her flowered taffeta housecoat and went quietly down the hall to Judith's room, where she rapped lightly.

"It's Sylvie, Judith," she said, with her lips near the panel of the door so that Chloe, in her adjoining room, might not be disturbed. "May I come in?"

Judith opened the door, looking magnificent in a marigold-yellow negligee of some rough, thick silk that was almost barbaric in its splendor of color. Her shining black hair was loose about her shoulders and her face was dewily fresh from the cold cream that had removed every trace of her makeup. Even so, Sylvie told herself, her heart sinking a little, Julith was the loveliest thing she had even seen in her life.

"I can't imagine what you could possibly have to say that would be of interest to me," Judith said with that new insolence that had come with the discovery that she was free of the island and with an income sufficient to take care of her wherever she wanted to live. "But if it's important, come in—though I'm pretty busy."

Sylvie stepped into the room and closed the door. Two suitcases lay open on the bed, and Judith went on with her packing.

"Judith—you didn't really mean that you are leaving Halcyon?"

JUDITH folded a piece of blossom-tinted lingerie before she answered, "What do you think?"

"But, Judith—I'm leaving. There is to be an annulment of my marriage to Kim. He'll be free very soon."

"So what?" asked Judith, her hands moving deftly with her job.

"So you can marry him!" said Sylvie.

Judith's mouth curled so that it wasn't soft and lovely any more, and her eyes were brightly derisive.

"Well, now isn't that just dandy?" she drawled. "But suppose I don't want to marry him—then what?"

"But, Judith, that's not true. You love him—I know you do—and Kim's mad about you!"

"Look, innocent," said Judith, and now her tone was more insolent than ever, "I admit that I was pretty crazy about Kim—when I was just a poor relation and he was the 'Master of the Manor.' I'd have married him like a shot, so that I could have been mistress here and not an unpaid servant."

"You've never been an unpaid servant here, Judith," Sylvie flashed. "You've always been a member of the family with the same rights and privileges as any of the others."

"Sure, the right and privilege of licking Chloe's boots and kowtowing to her from morning till night for the sake of peace and quiet and three meals a day," said Judith sharply. "Well, now that I am going to have some money of my own, I'm also going to have some life of my own. I've been chained to this hole long enough. I want to get out and see street lights at night, and go shopping in something besides jerkwater villages. Now that I've got my own money—"

"Which Chloe gave you." Sylvie could not keep back the words.

"Which I earned, ducky — don't forget that! Putting up with Chloe for years and years is hard work in anybody's language."

Sylvie drew a long, hard breath and after a moment she said. "But Kim loves you, Judith."

Judith preened herself a little and said, "Yes, I think he does — which makes it just too bad for you, but no concern of mine any longer."

"What do you mean—'too bad for me'?"

"Don't be a little fool! Anybody with half an eye could see that you are crazy about him. I'm afraid it embarrasses him a little to have you being so bride-like and adoring, when he doesn't care two pins for you!" Judith laughed maliciously.

Sylvie caught her breath as though Judith had slapped her. Was she really as transparent as that? Had she let Kim see that she loved him? Judith had stripped the last scrap of pride from her and she dared not say anything more lest she burst into tears.

She turned blindly to the door, hearing Judith's spiteful little laugh as she fled to the safety of her own room, her cheeks burning beneath the taunt that had been in Judith's eyes and voice quite as much as in her words.

Judith said that she had betrayed her affection for Kim so frankly that Kim had been embarrassed by it! Was that why he had been stiff and uncomfortable with her, why he had been almost curt at times? The thought made her face burn and filled her with an almost wild desire to get away from the island as fast as she could. She would pack up and leave tomorrow — as soon as Judith had gone. She couldn't bear to leave with Judith. She hoped she might never have to see Judith again. She buried her face in her pillow and wept stormily, as a lonely, frightened child weeps out its grief and hurt and terror alone.

CHAPTER XXIV

THEY met at the breakfast table, all of the family except Judith, who had slept late and asked for breakfast in her own room since it would be her last meal here.

Almost before they were settled at the table, Andrew said, "Chloe, I'm going to draw up those papers for you today—but first, Laura and I have something to say. You tell her, darling."

Laura said swiftly, her eyes shining a little, "It is only this, darling; we just wanted you to know that we are staying on at Halcyon and carrying on exactly as we have been doing since the first—if you'll let us."

Chloe put down the cup she had been about to fill and looked from Andrew to Laura. "Oh, but you—you've always wanted to get away!" she exclaimed, taken so by surprise that she could scarcely manage her voice.

Laura shook her head. Andrew put out his hand and Laura laid hers in it, a close, warm clasp that spoke of the union of their hearts and their lives as well as their hands.

"We thought we did, darling," she told Chloe swiftly. "When we thought we had to stay, we hated the place—or at least I did. I don't think Andy ever really wanted to go. I just made him so miserable sitting around and whining that the poor lamb was willing to do anything for peace! Well, now that" — she turned her head for an instant and looked across the garden to the Ghost Walk—"now that we are free to go, we don't want to. I've discovered that I love Halcyon, and I want to stay, darling—for always."

"My dear — my dear!" Chloe said huskily.

Laura came and kissed her and the two women smiled warmly at each other. Then Laura said, "We've wasted an awful lot of time being enemies, Chloe. I'm the fool! I was the one who wanted to fight. Think of all the fun I've missed in not being friends with you!"

Chloe laughed and patted her cheek, saying, "Never mind, darling. We'll make up lost time."

Laura went back to her place at the table. Chloe looked about the room and her eyes rested tenderly on the others. Peter beamed happily at her. Sylvie smiled shyly and then looked back at her plate.

"Sylvie, my dear," Chloe said gently, "you told me last night that Peter had pointed out a job you could get. What sort of a job, Peter?"

"Well, she's a really fine musician, Chloe. There are orchestras that would be tickled to death to have her—night clubs, shows—" began Peter, but Kim cut in savagely:

"Don't be a fool! Can any of you imagine Sylvie in that kind of a job?"

"If you want to give music lessons," Chloe suggested, "why not the job at the school? We talked about it, you remember. I think it would be an excellent idea. The salary is not large, but you would have no expenses."

"You mean I could stay on at the island?"

"You'd like that?" asked Chloe.

Sylvie caught her breath and then looked at Kim. He was watching her with an odd expression that brought the color to her face in a little burning tide. She remembered what Judith had said last night: "I'm afraid it embarrasses him a little to have you so bride-like and adoring." Her eyes dropped to her plate and she said hurriedly, "I'm —I'm afraid not. I—that is, I think it might be best if I went away. I'm sure I can find work."

"You will have your trust fund," Kim pointed out.

"No," said Sylvie, "I can't accept that. I—I won't."

"You're being very foolish—" Kim began.

Sylvie was on her feet, trembling a little, saying shakily, "All right, I'm foolish—but I can't take any more from any of you. I've taken far too much already. I've got to get away—please forgive me—" Unable to endure any more, she turned and ran through the long French window that was open to the terrace and down the path through the garden.

Behind her the dining-room was still for a moment as they sat staring after her. Then Peter turned to Kim, saying savagely, "Well, what are you waiting for? Go after her, you fool. Can't you see what's wrong? She's terribly in love with you—and she thinks you love Judith!"

Chloe said, wide-eyed, "Is that what's the matter?"

"Of course," returned Peter, "only he's too blind to see it."

"I've had some suspicions," said Laura.

KIM said, "Thanks, old man; excuse me, Chloe," and was off after Sylvie.

He found her at the foot of the garden path where a climbing rosebush shook out its petals above an old marble bench. Sylvie, concealed from the house by the thickly growing tendrils of the bush, lay huddled on the bench, crying. Kim paused and stood above her for a moment before he spoke.

"Peter's either the biggest fool alive —or the wisest man in the world," he said hesitantly.

At the sound of his voice Sylvie sat swiftly erect, her head turned away from him, mopping her eyes with a wet scrap of a handkerchief.

As men have been doing in such situations from time immemorial, and as they will probably go on doing until time stops, Kim offered her a crisply folded fresh handkerchief. Sylvie, as women do in such situations, accepted it with almost inaudible thanks.

"The reason I think Peter is either very wise, or very foolish," explained Kim when she did not ask the expected question, "is that he says you are in love with me."

Sylvie gave a little gasp and shrank from him, burying her face in the folds of his handkerchief.

"That's probably the only thing in the world that would have given me the nerve to follow you like this," said Kim after a moment. "Because I've behaved so badly to you that when I woke up one morning and discovered I was in love with you—"

Sylvie jerked herself around to face him, her eyes wide, the tears staining her flushed cheeks.

"You—you don't mean that—" she stammered.

"Then why would I say it?" asked Kim.

"Because—because you're sorry for me."

"Well, for the love of heaven, why should feel sorry for you?" he demanded. "You're young, beautiful — very beautiful—and you are at least modestly rich, you're healthy, people are very fond of you—why should anybody feel sorry for you?"

"You would, because I love you and can't conceal it very well!" The truth slipped out in spite of her.

"You can't conceal it?" Kim took her into his arms with an urgency that would not be denied. "Well, I only hope you never try to conceal anything else. Oh, Sylvie—" His voice broke and his arms tightened about her. He bent his head and kissed her as though for a long long time he had hungered and thirsted for her kiss and it would take a lot of kisses to appease that hunger and thirst.

After a long enchanted moment he held her a little away from him and looked down at her anxiously. "You did say you loved me, didn't you Sylvie?"

"Oh, Kim, yes! From the very first. There was a little while when I was hurt and frightened, and I tried to think I didn't love you. I was just fooling myself, and not doing a very good job," she cried, halfway between tears and laughter. "I even tried to tell myself I must never trust love, because it can hurt so terribly—"

"Darling sweet—that's blasphemy," Kim protested, shocked. "I tried not to believe what I felt for you was love. I'd never really been in love before, and it—well, it scared the daylights out of me—finding out, as I did the night of the 'possum hunt, how completely you put yourself in someone else's power when you love them. Oh, Sylvie, Sylvie—you're so little and so sweet—and I love you so much. We're going to be so—so terribly happy here at Halcyon—"

And Sylvie said nothing. It was a moment too perfect for words. It was a moment in which she drew closer to him and lifted her soft mouth for his kiss, and on her lips her heart was laid, his for the taking through their two lives.
